ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Many people have been supportive of the work that appears in these pages. The faculty of my undergraduate program at Nazareth College encouraged me early on to challenge accepted theories and practices during my introduction to the field of rhetoric and composition. I especially thank Dr. Deborah Dooley, Dr. Monica Weis, and Dr. Alex Sutherland for their support at that time in my life. I also thank Krista Ratcliffe and Janice Lauer for writing letters of recommendation for my sabbatical, and Millikin University for granting me the sabbatical that gave me time to write this book. Janice also read an early version of chapter one; her comments were much appreciated. The support of Millikin's Nyberg Grants for faculty development and scholarship related to teaching also contributed to this work by supplying time and resources for me to work with other faculty in the first-year writing program to create collaborative approaches to curriculum building. Randy Brooks, the chair of the English Department at Millikin, has celebrated every stage of the process as I waited for final approval of this project; for that I thank him. Irwin "Bud" Weiser read versions of early chapters and was encouraging at every step; his support is at the heart of my ability to believe in this project at the earliest stages and most difficult times. The reviewers of this manuscript were generous and encouraging in their responses. I thank them for their time and for listening so carefully to this text.

Nancy Bragg introduced me to service learning in ways that fostered integrated approaches to teaching, service, research, and scholarship. In doing so, she changed the course of my thinking about the teaching of first-year writing and helped me to create stronger connections between that work and my community literacy work. For this she has my deepest gratitude. Nancy also introduced me to my community partners at Project READ in Decatur. Vicki Harbeck and Dianne DeVore were so welcoming and so willing to work together toward shared goals for all of our students that much of the success of my work in this area is owed to them.

Many students, colleagues, and friends contributed to this book. Nicole Cassidy, Jennifer Eason, Kathy Klemesrud, Travis Meisenheimer, Linda Osborne, Carrie Owens, and Meg Schleppenbach added much to an analysis of the empirical data that appears in chapter one. Linda and Nicole also spent time doing a final reading of the book; their comments have made the work clearer. Bonnie Gunzenhauser and Rosemarie King generously agreed to teach the curriculum discussed in chapter three and did much to enhance that curriculum as we worked together to integrate reading into the first-semester courses in new ways. Bonnie also read numerous versions of this manuscript; her comments and her belief in this project sustained me throughout the process. Her friendship over the past five years has reintroduced me to the joys of teaching, travel, and research and has given me renewed self-confidence. Ed and Mary Yonan also read chapters as they were written; their insightful and intelligent responses inspired me to remember the larger educational context for my work. Beth Hoyer sent letters of support and sabbatical treats that greatly enriched my research and writing time. Denise Myers made time to listen as I worked through difficult points. Linda Osborne and Cindy Giesing instituted “Nancy Night” during my sabbatical. Every Thursday they would cook a great meal with food that was beyond my sabbatical budget, open a bottle of wine, and listen to what I had written that week. Their commitment to this project, and to the ideas of participation and contribution that form its core, created a home for my work. Erica Friscaro, Katie Malcolm, and Karl Stolley, previous undergraduate students who are now in the field, have given me concrete ways to understand the importance of my work in their lives and in the field. All of these students, colleagues, and friends spent hours listening and responding to my ideas. In fact, all of the undergraduate students I have shared classrooms with over the past eight years have supported this work in one way or another, often generously agreeing to try new things and to take risks with their own ideas and assignments. Although they are too numerous to name, I thank each of them here, especially Christopher Bronke, Elizabeth Ledman, Susan Barco, Mary Ellen Paley, and Jenny Medden Giesler.

I also thank my mother, Cecilia DeJoy, for all of her interest in this project. Even though she has been busy pursuing her own undergraduate education, she has maintained a serious interest in my progress and has made space for my work in her home during my visits. All of my brothers and sisters, Susan, Sheryl, Bob, Pat, Dave, Dan, and Brian also made room in their lives to discuss my work and its progress.

Finally, I would like to thank Michael Spooner for all of his direction and support throughout the submission, revision, and publication process. His directness, enthusiasm, and attention were more thoughtful and encouraging than this first-time book author could have ever hoped for.
