Improving the Accessibility of Health Services in Urban and Regional Settings for Indigenous People

Australian Government, Australian Government Institute of Health and Welfare & Australian Institute of Family Studies

While a comprehensive set of health services is available in the majority of metropolitan areas both in rural and urban settings, often times individuals have difficulty accessing these services due to transportation, monetary or other restrictions. This piece examines nearly 30 research studies in addition to reports from field practice to investigate how Indigenous Australians' access to health care services can be increased. A broad set of implementation strategies are presented to enable Indigenous and non-Indigenous specific health services to help ameliorate the obstacles faced in accessing their facilities and programs.
