MEET A LEADER

CAROL ANDERSON,
Recognition Lead, Service to the Armed Forces, Townsend

The armed forces need to know that there is someone who cares about them and supports them. I enjoy supporting the volunteers who support the armed forces.

FUN FACT: I love to read. I especially enjoy romance and science fiction.

Gentry Young, who was severely injured in a car crash 11 years ago, donates platelets once or twice a month and whole blood twice a year. "I donate back in a sense to repay a debt," she said.

Blood recipient pays it forward

Seriously injured in wreck, Montana woman makes it her mission to donate blood, platelets to others in crisis

Gentry Young knows she's lucky to be alive. "Heaven is real, but I had enough angels here on earth looking out for me that I got to come back," the Great Falls woman said.

Young was on her way home from Bozeman to see her family in Power in 2008 when disaster struck. Between Townsend and Helena, Young was involved in a three-vehicle crash and was severely injured. Her neck was broken, her face disfigured and her left arm mangled. Responders used the jaws of life to pry her from her vehicle before an ambulance rushed her to Helena. There she was loaded on a helicopter and flown to Great Falls. Doctors there decided her best hope was to be flown to Seattle.

"I was bleeding to death out of my arm," she said.

Young's family estimated she needed nine units of blood to keep her going on her way to Seattle, blood available because of the generosity of donors like those who give to the American Red Cross.

"I barely made it," said Young, who was in a coma for a month in Seattle and in a medically induced coma for another month in Great Falls.

Without those blood donors, her story would have turned out much differently, Young said, and now she makes it her personal mission to give that same gift to others who might be going through a similar crisis.

"I donate back in a sense to repay a debt," the 31-year-old said.

She donates platelets once or twice a month and whole blood twice a year and has given close to five gallons to the Red Cross so far.

Her accident isn't the only reason she gives – she also does it for her grandmother Audrey, who died from leukemia in January.

"She managed to last about eight more months than they thought she would, and a lot of that was because of the platelets that were brought to her," Young said.

Before Audrey passed, her great-grandson was born.

"She got to have memories of him that she wouldn't have had without these platelets," Young said.

Young still bears the wounds of her horrific crash 11 years ago. She has epileptic seizures that make it difficult for her to return to college

“There is a reason I’m back here, and it is to help people out.”

Woman thanks Red Cross after fire

Paige Plancich was in Whistler, British Columbia, celebrating Christmas with family when she got the call from her boyfriend. Her apartment was on fire.

Plancich asked him how bad it was and if she needed to return home to Helena. Alex Facetimed her, and she watched as smoke billowed from the apartment and firetrucks surrounded the building.

She and her mother caught the red-eye home the next morning.

Alex was waiting for them at the airport in Plancich's car, which had been parked near the apartment building the night before. That's when reality set in.

"My car was covered in black soot and a whole bunch of debris," she said. "So my initial welcome back to Helena was 'Oh my God, this does not look good.'"

A lifetime of belongings had

Fire: ‘Doing very well’

been reduced to what she had in her carry-on suitcase.

“I didn’t have just even the basics ... underwear, shirts, pants, socks, shoes,” she said. “I’ve never had that feeling ever in my life. It was a very humbling experience.”

But Plancich quickly learned that she wouldn’t have to start the long recovery process alone.

“Red Cross was already helping me before I even landed back in Helena,” Plancich said.

She had lunch with Disaster Action Team volunteers the next day, and they began to walk her through the services they could provide.

And they listened.

“They made me feel like my feelings were real, and I had nothing to be ashamed of,” she said. “So many people kept telling me things can be replaced, and at first that kind of made me angry because no one is letting me feel my feelings.

“The Red Cross set me up if I wanted to see a therapist and they gave me debit cards if I needed to get some new clothes. Just the support that Red Cross gave me all throughout the process was incredible ... all the advice, all the check-ins, everything was so much appreciated.”

Plancich was told the fire most likely started in an aging furnace. There was one smoke alarm in the apartment attached to a raised ceiling well beyond her reach.

Firefighters believe it didn’t even have a battery.

A mental health technician at the Shodair Children’s Hospital, Plancich is now in a new apartment.

“I’m actually doing very well,” she said. “I thankfully had a lot of donations from the community and a lot of support from my boyfriend and his family.”

In May, a Red Cross team stopped by during their Sound the Alarm smoke alarm installation event, one of more than 40 homes they visited that weekend.

Paige Plancich said she is doing well now, six months after her Helena apartment was destroyed by fire. “Just the support that Red Cross gave me all throughout the process was incredible ... all the advice, all the check-ins, everything was so much appreciated.”

They checked Plancich’s alarms and discussed the best ways to escape her home in case of fire.

She didn’t take it for granted.

“It’s good to have a plan,” she said.

“Before I was like, ‘Oh nothing bad will ever happen to me. I’m not that small fraction of people whose house will catch on fire.’”

Red Cross installs free smoke alarms in homes across Montana and Idaho and teaches families about fire safety.

or hold a job and can’t raise her left arm completely.

And she takes nothing for granted.

“Just the fact that I can use my left arm at all reminds me to be so grateful of all the people who donated that blood,” she said.

Right now Young is working on a novel – “it’s the best way for me to vent out my troubles and find a way to help others who are venting out their troubles” – and volunteers with her church.

“Faith has gotten me a long ways.”

And besides giving blood and platelets, she also donates her hair to Wigs for Kids.

“There’s a reason I’m back here, and it is to help other people out,” she said.

Platelet and blood donors of all types are urged to give to help trauma patients like Young and others who depend on these lifesaving products.

A blood donation takes about an hour from start to finish, but the actual donation itself takes only eight to 10 minutes.

Schedule an appointment today by using the Blood Donor App, visiting RedCrossBlood.org or calling 800-RED CROSS.
