When he was a baby, Colton Phillips (left) was diagnosed with brain cancer and needed countless blood transfusions during the surgery and treatments that followed. Now 30 years old, Colton is seen here with his father Jim, brother Austin and mother Gale. The family is planning a blood drive on Feb. 21 to raise awareness of the importance and impact of blood donation.

Paying back the gift of life

Thirty years ago, Gale and Jim Phillips’ infant son Colton was in an Oakland hospital fighting for his life. Now, three decades and countless blood transfusions later, Colton is doing well, and his parents are organizing a Red Cross blood drive in February in Idaho City to raise awareness of the profound impact blood donors have on families like theirs.

“We just felt like it was so important to give the community the opportunity to save a life,” she said.

A couple weeks after he was born, Colton became very sick, and Gale and Jim, who were living in Eureka, Calif., at the time, took him to a nearby hospital. Initially, doctors diagnosed him with hydrocephalus, which causes fluid buildup in the brain and excessive pressure. The Phillips were told a shunt would solve the problem.

But four weeks later Colton’s condition worsened, and he was life flighted to the Oakland Children’s Hospital. Within minutes of his arrival, an MRI revealed Colton had brain cancer. A 12-hour brain surgery followed.

“It was terrifying,” Gale said.

During that time, Colton’s entire blood supply had to be replaced three times.

“So at a very young age – my husband and I were 21 – we realized how important it was that people donated blood because without that our baby wouldn’t have made it,” she said.

During the next year, Colton was in and out of the Oakland hospital as he underwent chemotherapy and continued to receive blood transfusions. Things seemed to be heading in the right direction, but then doctors discovered cancer cells in his back and saw that his main

Red Cross gives partners a boost

As Red Cross prepared for a renovation of its Great Falls Blood Donation Center and offices, local nonprofits got a helping hand along the way.

During the heart of the COVID pandemic, Red Cross built up a large stock of sanitation supplies like wipes, bleach and hand sanitizer, supplies that didn’t have a home as they cleaned out their facilities in anticipation of the remodel. That’s when Great Falls fleet and maintenance tech Rick Baker and volunteer Angela James reached out to the Maclean-Animal Adoption Center and the Great Falls Animal Shelter to see if they could put these supplies to good use. Both facilities raised their hands.

them to clean out their kennels,” Rick said. “They were very, very appreciative.”

Red Cross also had office furniture that needed to be removed, and Habitat for Humanity was the perfect fit. District Manager Carmen Madsen helped make that happen.

“This was a great example of staff going above and beyond and caring about the community,” said Wendy McGrew, the regional chief operating officer.

Board blood drive a success

A Missoula blood drive organized by the Montana Red Cross Board of Directors brought in 30 units of lifesaving blood, including five power red donations.

Board chairman Craig Stahlberg, board member and former board chair Tom Wozniak and board member David Roberts were among those donating.

"The board rallied their friends and co-workers to make this drive a success," said Montana Red Cross Executive Director Diane Wright, who also donated at the drive. "I am grateful for their leadership and commitment to the mission of the American Red Cross."

The annual drive takes place during National Blood Donor Month in January, a great opportunity to recognize generous blood donors and encourage others to raise their hands, roll up their sleeves and donate the vital blood so many families depend on.

Last year's board drive saw 31 donors come through the door including nine first-time donors.

tumor was growing. Meningitis followed, and Jim and Gale made the difficult decision to stop treatment and bring Colton home so he could be more comfortable. Against all odds, Colton began to recover.

Now age 30, Colton deals with epilepsy and other challenges related to his illness but is doing well and works a couple of hours each week at the local library. He plans to attend the family's Red Cross blood drive Feb. 21 at the Christian Center in Idaho City.

"He wants to give back to the world that gave him his life," Gale said. "Colton is in awe that we live in a world where we're able to do this kind of stuff."

Gale and Jim, who have lived in Idaho City for the past five years after 25 years in the Boise valley, are both blood donors, though Gale said she was a bit hesitant at first.

"I'm scared of needles so I'm just surprised at how easy and how comfortable the (staff) makes you feel," she said. "The employees of the Red Cross are very understanding, compassionate and patient and they make a very uncomfortable thing comfortable."

The Phillips said they hope the upcoming blood drive will be the first of many they will help organize and will never forget the generosity and kindness of the blood donors who helped keep their son alive during their darkest days.

"We are so grateful that they were able to be an instrumental part of saving our son's life," Gale said. "Without the blood, the doctors and the nurses and the hospitals couldn't do it."
