Subject: Problems With YouTube Captioning

Has anyone had problems with YouTube captioning defaulting to their auto-generated captions instead of the captioning files you've uploaded? We've never had this problem before, but I uploaded some vids on Friday night, along with their captioning files, and in the player, it either uses the YouTube captions or doesn't show that captions are available at all (even though it shows the CC symbol in the Video Manager). All our previous videos are working just fine (using our captions). I deleted and redid one of the uploads, but it didn't help. By Saturday, two of nine videos were working properly (with our captions), but this morning, one of those was back to playing the YouTube captions. I've looked over the process numerous times and even compared screens to our previous videos, and I can't find anything set up differently. I'm at a loss... Thanks in advance for any insight you can offer.

Hello to our OPM colleagues.

You used to have a wonderful feature on usajobs.gov that let someone do a search and then create an RSS feed of that search. For several years, across two agencies, I've used that feed to drive multiple channels: automated daily emails with new listings, job listings on our website, and Twitter feeds. Here at USCIS, for example, the daily email has 31,000 subscribers. I seem to remember from my time at EPA that they had even more email subscribers.

It seems that in your recent redesign, you dropped that service. I'm not here to complain; we all have to make decisions based on resource use and the benefit that results. But I did want to let you know that service was used by at least two agencies, and ask whether there's any chance I could talk you into reinstating it?

Thanks!

I rather RSS than social media.

I always thought that RSS was the lowest cost, least intrusive, option for both provider and consumer. Isn't it just a plain web page?

Don't the modern content manager systems automate it, eg. WordPress feeds?

Personally, as a consumer, I do my own aggregation, and I like that.

Does anyone use WordPress feeds or anything similar?

"What is RSS

... Wouldn't it be nice if you could tell your favorite websites to let you know every time they update? Well, this is exactly what RSS does. RSS allows users to keep track of their favorite websites without having to manually visit the website each time."

<http://www.wpbeginner.com/beginners-guide/what-is-rss-how-to-use-rss-in-wordpress/>

I find RSS more appealing than mechanism likes "following" in flickr.com or "channels" in youtube.com. It's easier on my mailbox too.

Or is the difficulty training/maintaining the content submitter?

I don't get it. I have always felt RSS the most considerate way for a provider to "get my number".

Happy Monday,

Hi (b) (6)

Just to add onto this one. If you were using the RSS feed to be notified of updates, meaning new jobs posting since that's the only place the RSS feed was, you can set up a saved search through your USAJOBS account as well. When setting it up, you can select your notification frequency. While this of course wouldn't be the best method for agencies as in Jeffrey's question, it could certainly assist an individual user.

Hi -

We recently stepped through the process of building an MVP product on our site using the USAJobs API. It worked pretty well for us, so thank you for the API reference guide. We plan on making a few more adjustments here soon. We like offering a list of USFS opportunities directly on our site, especially since we see a fair amount of 'job seeker' traffic for temporary/seasonal positions as well as for permanent.

Thanks Dan Thibodeau. I think the last time I visited a US government job site was more than 10 years ago. I expected little. I was not surprised.

Not sure what you mean by an RSS search. What I'm used to is a subscription to a website, then whenever the website adds a "new" RSS feed, my aggregator has a chance to compare to my history. I don't have to search. When I turn on my aggregator, it compares notes with the website RSS feed, and if the feed is new, downloads the feed.

To me, once I set the subscription, it's a no-brainer, even better than a mailbox, because the aggregator waits for my signal to go out and compare dates and request the feed.

I manually aggregate with Mozilla Thunderbird. Prior to that, I used to pay Radio Userland. I think it was $10/mth, and worth it. After they quit, I found it simpler to do my own aggregation, plus I don't have to "log in" another time.

Maybe it's quaint, but I'm beginning to think that more and more web technology has moved away from my preferences as a consumer of both information and goods and services. Maybe it's because I don't fit the right profile.

One on my long-standing subscriptions is - <https://www.schneier.com/blog/atom.xml>

Hello to our OPM colleagues.

You used to have a wonderful feature on usajobs.gov that let someone do a search and then create an RSS feed of that search. For several years, across two agencies, I've used that feed to drive multiple channels: automated daily emails with new listings, job listings on our website, and Twitter feeds. Here at USCIS, for example, the daily email has 31,000 subscribers. I seem to remember from my time at EPA that they had even more email subscribers.

It seems that in your recent redesign, you dropped that service. I'm not here to complain; we all have to make decisions based on resource use and the benefit that results. But I did want to let you know that service was used by at least two agencies, and ask whether there's any chance I could talk you into reinstating it?

To add my vote for restoring the RSS feature and the use case. We are/were using the RSS feed internally on a WordPress-based intranet site to list career specific feeds and it is one of the most popular features. The API does give you some additional flexibility if you're hand coding a website, but the simplicity of using a plugin (e.g., RSS Aggregator) makes the service far more portable and consumable by the masses.

Hi (b) (6)

Just to add onto this one. If you were using the RSS feed to be notified of updates, meaning new jobs posting since that's the only place the RSS feed was, you can set up a saved search through your USAJOBS account as well. When setting it up, you can select your notification frequency. While this of course wouldn't be the best method for agencies as in (b) (6), (b) (7)(C) question, it could certainly assist an individual user.

So there's this (my emphasis):

For example, many cities struggle to build citizen-centric sites where information is organized around user needs rather than agency needs. The result is inconsistencies as users look up information on city parks, trash removal and transportation, since each of these functions is typically run by a different organization. The solution here is stronger accountability, so that government agencies have clear performance criteria for their websites and are held responsible if they do not meet these benchmarks.

Naw, bruh. Wrong solution.

A 21st century solution is to unlock this content from a "site." We continue to be shackled to this metaphor of a place to go. This is not helpful. We need to make a different investment for the future.

So the solution here is to make information available so it can be served in multiple formats--so that Google results can pick up your hours of operation and display them in a card, so that an aggregator can pick up related content and pull it together in an app, so that Alexa answers the question, so that it surfaces easily in a social search, so you can even post it on a website with it's dwindling visits, so you can feed your contact centers, and, most importantly, so you update it in one spot and it promulgates itself.

Practically speaking, there has been some terrific work from people in this community on structured content models as well as syndication beyond a site (I wish all gov content was available via API).

Time to break out of old, webpage-centric thinking. ::ducks::

Interesting take from the author of the ITIF study. So the solution is we all need to "partner" with IDEO? I think he meant to say they "paid" IDEO. If building good websites is just remembering three things, then why pay a high-priced design firm?

Anyway, the third point I love. Websites (or at least web content) should have expiration dates. Great idea.

I thought this was a good article with some great tips and examples.
<http://www.govtech.com/analysis/Worst-of-the-Web.html>

One personal observation: in many conversations that I have had with developers and content managers, there is great emphasis placed on the relative merits of the tools. Such as Drupal versus WordPress; Ruby versus Python; CMS versus static site generators. These discussions are important to the folks who build and manage the sites. However, the end user doesn't care about the particular technology. The end user just wants a site that works. I bring this up because shifting to design thinking to construct a site will work much better if the initial focus is not on the technology being used.

All opinions are my own and does not reflect the opinions of my agency.

So there's this (my emphasis):

For example, many cities struggle to build citizen-centric sites where information is organized around user needs rather than agency needs. The result is inconsistencies as users look up information on city parks, trash removal and transportation, since each of these functions is typically run by a different organization. The solution here is stronger accountability, so that government agencies have clear performance criteria for their websites and are held responsible if they do not meet these benchmarks.

Naw, bruh. Wrong solution.

A 21st century solution is to unlock this content from a "site." We continue to be shackled to this metaphor of a place to go. This is not helpful. We need to make a different investment for the future.

So the solution here is to make information available so it can be served in multiple formats--so that Google results can pick up your hours of operation and display them in a card, so that an aggregator can pick up related content and pull it together in an app, so that Alexa answers the question, so that it surfaces easily in a social search, so you can even post it on a website with it's dwindling visits, so you can feed your contact centers, and, most importantly, so you update it in one spot and it promulgates itself.

Practically speaking, there has been some terrific work from people in this community on structured content models as well as syndication beyond a site (I wish all gov content was available via API).

Time to break out of old, webpage-centric thinking. ::ducks::

I thought this was a good article with some great tips and examples.
<http://www.govtech.com/analysis/Worst-of-the-Web.html>

One personal observation: in many conversations that I have had with developers and content managers, there is great emphasis placed on the relative merits of the tools. Such as Drupal versus WordPress; Ruby versus Python; CMS versus static site generators. These discussions are important to the folks who build and manage the sites. However, the end user doesn't care about the particular technology. The end user just wants a site that works. I bring this up because shifting to design thinking to construct a site will work much better if the initial focus is not on the technology being used.

All opinions are my own and does not reflect the opinions of my agency.

Hi -

We recently stepped through the process of building an MVP product on our site using the USAJobs API. It worked pretty well for us, so thank you for the API reference guide. We plan on making a few more adjustments here soon. We like offering a list of USFS opportunities directly on our site, especially since we see a fair amount of 'job seeker' traffic for temporary/seasonal positions as well as for permanent.

Hello to our OPM colleagues.

You used to have a wonderful feature on usajobs.gov that let someone do a search and then create an RSS feed of that search. For several years, across two agencies, I've used that feed to drive multiple channels: automated daily emails with new listings, job listings on our website, and Twitter feeds. Here at USCIS, for example, the daily email has 31,000 subscribers. I seem to remember from my time at EPA that they had even more email subscribers.

It seems that in your recent redesign, you dropped that service. I'm not here to complain; we all have to make decisions based on resource use and the benefit that results. But I did want to let you know that service was used by at least two agencies, and ask whether there's any chance I could talk you into reinstating it?

Thanks!

Does anyone on this list have a contact at Google who either deals with federal websites, or might be able to answer a question about how their search results quick charts are presented? Just in case someone here might also already know the answer to my question, here is the issue:

If you type into Google search "population of [a specific US geography such as 'madison, wi' or 'montgomery county md']" or, alternatively, "[geography] population", you will most of the time get a graph of that place's population over time, with the following footnote: "Sources include: United States Census Bureau." The footnote links to a reference page that has moved. I believe that these graphs are created using a template, or code that builds a template, and that source note is hard-coded in. Some of my colleagues believe that the source note is derived from wherever Google is getting the data. In either case, we need to get Google to fix it, because it is generating 404s.

If you can share a Google contact likely to help, or a definitive solution because you've had a similar issue, I would hugely appreciate it.

Thanks in advance,

Other than using RightNow as a public-facing FAQs database manager, are there other recommended options? Digitalgov's TOS page doesn't list any tools of that nature, from what I can tell, but I found Zendesk (or Zendesk-similar) in use by at least two agency sites.

Thanks in advance!

Hi Beth,

NLM migrated to Parature last year which is our customer service portal. We released our knowledge base of FAQs in December and are in the process deleting the duplicates form our website. My colleague Wanda Whitney manages the project and would be happy to tell you more about it.

Hi everyone.

I was just poking around <https://analytics.usa.gov/> and discovered the data page: <https://analytics.usa.gov/data/>

I was curious how our site's device split (desktop vs. mobile vs. tablet) compared to the gov't-wide average, so I pulled down the federal data. Attached is the resulting spreadsheet covering the last three months. It's updated every day, so today's file covers Feb. 4 – May 4.

Then I looked at our own Google Analytics.

Here's what I found:

Happy Friday!

Quick question – I’m wondering if there are any agencies out there that are using a public website (.gov website available to the general public) for internal employee communications. In short, does anyone have any experience with providing “intranet”-type content as a section of their public .gov website (or separate website).

We’re trying to address an issue here at DHS where a significant portion of our workforce can’t access our intranet site for employee communications because the site is available only when logged into the DHS network (and they don’t have regular access – think TSA and CBP officers in the field)... wondering if anyone has any experience that they can share.

Thanks!

Whoops!

I flipped our Spanish percentages, which is significant because our Spanish site flips the norms: 2/3 of people come on mobile devices.

Interesting insights regarding your Spanish language users vs. your English users, Jeffrey!

I wanted to point out that the agency pages on analytics.usa.gov (accessed by the dropdown at the top) also present the mobile/desktop/tablet breakdown for sites belonging to that agency. Site-specific device breakdowns are accessible via the actual Google Analytics interface, but often the agency summaries can provide some interesting insight, as well. For example, HHS sites have more mobile visits (49%) than desktop (46%) in the last 90 days, whereas agencies like DOD still see sites dominated by desktop traffic (71%).

You can also use those agency-wide breakdowns to compare against your specific site. In Jeffrey's USCIS case, the data he found in Google Analytics for the English site is along the lines of the greater DHS averages (56% desktop, 40% mobile), but the Spanish version skews more desktop.

In any case, this kind of data can definitely help understand your users and their needs, as well as potentially alert us to issues accessing content on certain devices.

Thanks for the note, Jeffrey.

Best,

Tim

Subject: Update: Federal AI Personal Assistant Pilot
From: Justin Herman - TAE <justin.herman@GSA.GOV>

Content-Type: multipart/alternative
Parts/Attachments: text/plain (5 kB) , text/html (7 kB)

Greetings Web Content Managers,

I hope all is well and productive where you are. I'm pleased to make an update on our inter-agency communities' Federal AI Personal Assistant Pilot and identify next steps and where needs still exist.

As many of you know, the pilot was launched to test and evaluate public service information integration into consumer-available AI Personal Assistants (IPAs) -- and in the process lay a strong foundation for opening our programs to self-service programs in the home, mobile devices, automobiles and further developed by U.S. businesses.

We hoped to attract a pilot cohort of six agencies with diverse missions and resources, demonstrate practical use cases, and recommend next steps for tackling this emerging field of citizen services. We received more than 6X the declared interest from agencies, who as of this morning continue to reach out to participate (not counting our state, local and international colleagues who have also reached out), and industry partners continue to join the effort, from MITRE to Oracle's Adaptive Intelligent Applications department (in addition to Amazon Alexa, Google Assistant, Microsoft Cortana, and Facebook Messenger's chatbot service.)

It has been nothing short of exciting and overwhelming to discover how many of our missions are primed and ready to move into this space with clear purpose and resources -- enough so that this effort will most certainly not only become a permanent presence, but will look forward and outward to expanding in complexity and scope thanks to the determined contributions of innovators and stewards like yourself.

But first thing is first -- we need to get this initial pilot phase done and in the books. I've seen things this week, pretty incredible new program management services built based on ideas from the pilot, that I didn't think we'd see created until much later phases. As of today we are freezing new entries into the pilot, streamlining the number of concepts down to those ready to advance, and moving on so we can begin the work of institutionalizing this experience for all our colleagues and partners who want to take advantage. There will be plenty more where this came from.

Here's what you can do:

- Visit the Federal AI Personal Assistant Pilot wiki on Github
- Review participating concepts and agencies
- Please email me your Github user name and " #PilotUsername " in the subject if:
  - your agency has a participating concept
  - has a placeholder page but hasn't expanded their concept yet (if not, they may be paused from the pilot til a later time)
  - your agency is not listed but you can help suggest improvements in concepts or resources
- Register for our hackathon for the AI Personal Assistant Pilot, Wednesday May 17
  - Participating concepts will be expected to prepare their projects as much as they can in advance of the hackathon along with the cohort community
  - Specialists from both federal agencies and the innovative platforms opened in the pilot will be present to help tie loose ends and answer questions
  - Attendees do not need to be present the entire day -- they need to be present as little or long as they need to complete their pilot concepts.
  - I'm told a robot will be there. So there's also that.

Next week we are analyzing compliance considerations for this emerging field, and finalizing the combination of business cases and available data.

Thanks again to all of you who stepped forward and proved that the federal government is not only open to emerging citizen technologies, not only ready to test -- we are ready and determined to work together across agencies and with innovative U.S. businesses and startups to make the benefits of tomorrow a real and responsive service for citizens today.

Best regards,
Justin

Jillian:

The DAP program takes as many steps as possible to filter out non-human traffic. Google Analytics gives admins the ability to turn on a filter to remove traffic from known bots and spiders, which we enable for all DAP profiles. This comes from a list kept by the IAB that Google purchases and implements.

Additionally, after reports that people were spoofing Amazon to cause bot traffic in our systems, we also implemented a filter to eliminate that traffic.

It's an ever evolving battle, but we actively filter out any bot traffic we can identify.

Hope that helps.

Hi Folks,

I'm Phil Ashlock with Data.gov and I've been involved with the M-13-13 open data policy for the past few years. I'm sorry not to respond sooner, but I've provided an overview of options and what other agencies are doing below as well as some additional context on this policy.

The short answer is that if you don't already have a two-way feedback mechanism, Data.gov can get you set up with our Help Desk tool. More details below.

With regard to the policy, note that this isn't really a new requirement. As M-17-06 says, this is "Consistent with OMB Memorandum M-13-13" - the open data policy that agencies have been implementing since 2013. However, this particular aspect of providing a public two-way feedback mechanism has seen somewhat spotty implementation across agencies. Also note that while M-13-13 technically only applies to the CFO-Act agencies, we encourage everyone to follow it as a best practice. And while M-17-06 is generally defined as being applicable across all executive branch agencies, my understanding is that the "Provide Open Data Public Engagement" portion that draws from M-13-13 is actually still only a requirement for CFO-Act agencies. I believe this has been conveyed by OMB thru conversations at the web council, but if you need more clarification I can put you in touch with Justin Grimes at OFCIO or you can email infopolicy-oir@omb.eop.gov. I don't know what the timeline looks like for evaluating agency implementation of M-17-06, but agencies have been reviewed for M-13-13 quarterly since 2013 and those evaluations, including the scoring on Public Engagement, are posted publicly at <https://labs.data.gov/dashboard/offices>. The last evaluation was based on the state of implementation on February 28th and the next quarterly evaluation will be based on implementation as of May 31st.

As far as your options for providing a two-way feedback mechanism, again the short answer is that if you don't already have a customer service tool and workflow that's well integrated across your agency, then I recommend you use the Help Desk tool provided by Data.gov. You might be asking why each agency is asked to provide this mechanism if Data.gov is providing something already and my interpretation is that this is because 1) Even with our tool each agency is still responsible for the actual public engagement behind it and providing the final response and 2) If agencies have a customer service or public engagement tool/process for this which is (or could be) better integrated and institutionalized then they should be encouraged to use that. One point of clarification to note is that with M-13-13 the concept of a "two-way" feedback mechanism is one which acts more like a public forum where, to the extent practicable, the responses to feedback are also posted publicly.

Data.gov does still typically act as the initial point of entry for public inquiries so we do take responsibility for being as responsive as we can, but usually that means doing our best to delegate to the proper point of contact at the agency who can provide the answer. The main options for feedback with our Help Desk tool are to report a problem with an existing dataset and to request a new dataset. These options are both available from our contact page, but the page for each dataset in the catalog also includes the option to report a problem as well as a use case or success story that can be directly associated with the specific dataset. These options are built into Data.gov, so they're present regardless of the feedback mechanism (or lack thereof) in place by the agency. We currently connect these public inquiries to the appropriate agency via email in a somewhat manual process, but we are in the early stages of onboarding agencies so they can login to the administrative interface for the Help Desk tool better manage and respond to their inquiries directly. For agencies that have their own separate preferred tool, the goal is to be able to integrate directly with those via our API in the future.

The Help Desk tool is still a work in progress and we've yet to publish good documentation for how agencies can implement it, but for now I'll just share that here via email. Before I go into detail, let me first stress that you not simply link to data.gov/contact as many agencies are currently doing. Not only will this likely confuse your users, but it also puts more work on the Data.gov staff to determine which agency the user was coming from. Instead you should only use the Help Desk URL specifically associated with your agency or with a specific dataset.

The Help Desk tool is powered by an API and if you'd like richer integration on your website we can work with you to do that, but otherwise the easiest way to incorporate it on your [\[agency.gov\]/data](https://agency.gov/) page is to simply provide links to the different Help Desk pages associate with your agency or dataset. We're currently using a set of numerical agency IDs from the Federal Agency Directory API to associate these requests with your agency, but we'll be moving to a more human readable ID in the future. A list of agency IDs is copied at the bottom of this email.

To preselect your agency for a dataset being requested, you can add the parameter "agency_name" to the URL for the dataset request form and then just add your agency ID. Here's an example with the ID for GSA (49048)

https://www.data.gov/data-request/?agency\_name=49048

To preselect the URL for a dataset that has a problem, you can add the parameter "media_url" to the URL for the issue reporting form and then just append the dataset URL. Here's an example:

https://www.data.gov/issue/?media\_url=https://catalog.data.gov/dataset/national-stock-number-extract

To preselect the URL for a dataset that has a success story or notable use case, you can add the parameter "media_url" to the URL for the issue reporting form and then just append the dataset URL. Here's an example:

https://www.data.gov/story/?media\_url=https://catalog.data.gov/dataset/national-stock-number-extract

For requests that have been received and moderated, you can also provide links to URLs that show the current status of these requests. Here you can actually use a human readable agency abbreviation for the ID. Here are example URLs for GSA:

Issues: https://www.data.gov/issues/?agency\_responsible=GSA

Requests: https://www.data.gov/requests/?agency\_responsible=GSA

This concludes the overview of how to provide links to the Data.gov Help Desk.

To highlight a few agencies that are using other tools and doing a great job:

- For HHS, their hhs.gov/data page redirects to healthdata.gov which has a prominent "Feedback" link in the navigation as well as feedback buttons on each dataset in the catalog. The website is powered by the DKAN Drupal distribution. There's also a more robust methodology driven by MediaWiki and GitHub documented at ddod.healthdata.gov, but this seems to have been largely inactive for the past year.
- For SSA, there are a few links on ssa.gov/data to their active IdeaScale account and a page with a synthesis of results from their ongoing Customer Feedback Process

SYNOPSIS OF RESULTS FROM THEIR ONGOING CUSTOMER FEEDBACK PROCESS.

- I'd also like to note a few places where I've seen what appears to be a well structured process and ticketing system for responding to public requests about data. This may not be visible from their respective /data pages nor available in the public "two-way" type of forum I described earlier, but from personal experience I've seen very responsive customer centric mechanisms in place at the Department of Education and the Census Bureau.

Other tools that agencies are using include GitHub Issues, the Open Data StackExchange tagged for your agency, and features available as part of the Socrata SaaS.

I spent some time doing an updated evaluation for each agency which I'll make available for reference as part of OMB's May 31st quarterly review, but if you'd like me to directly share my current feedback for your agency's reference to a feedback mechanism on your /data page just let me know.

I know that's a lot, so congrats if you made it this far and please let me know if you have any questions.

Best,
Phil

We also do a similar thing (up arrow “promote”/down arrow “demote”) for our “Sounding Board” regarding the possible implementation of new ideas at State, with an option for comments below each idea.

Hello,

The USPTO website has a "Thumbs up/ Thumbs down" option on nearly all pages. Once you pick helpful/not helpful, you also get the option to give more substantive written comments. This feedback is collected at the page level, which allows us to know how customers feel about a specific page, rather than the whole site. This gives us good granular feedback such as the ability to look across our most positive/negatively reviewed content to see if there are patterns, such as the use a particular layout template that people find confusing.

However, in addition to this we also deploy a traditional website survey run by Foresee, which is a multi-question survey about the whole website experience (site speed, content, design, task completion etc.).

Hope this additional information is helpful,

~Laura

I too am very interested in this info.

Also — are there any feds out there whose agency website includes, as its primary customer satisfaction measurement, a simple binary indicator like thumbs up/down icons, smiley vs. frowny face, or the like? I assume this would be augmented with fields for the two-way part of the communication, but I'm interested in seeing any ways federal agency sites are handling this outside of multi-question surveys. Thanks!

Thanks for the useful information. Now if my office would only attempt to understand the importance of this type of data. Baby steps. ☺

Do you know if there is a similar tool for social media accounts? A free tool other than the analytics sections of those platforms. On another note, I was able to find demographic information on the PEW webpage for the Instagram platform. However, I wanted a deeper analytic dive (not just female traffic prevails over their male counterparts for this platform but what were they looking for or how were they using Insta?) and couldn't find a free resources for that.

Lastly, do you know if there are reoccurring meet-ups within the government whereby data is the topic?

Thanks and happy cinco!

Whoops!

I flipped our Spanish percentages, which is significant because our Spanish site flips the norms: 2/3 of people come on mobile devices.

Hi everyone.

I was just poking around Caution-https://analytics.usa.gov/ < Caution-https://analytics.usa.gov/> and discovered the data page: Caution-https://analytics.usa.gov/data/ < Caution-https://analytics.usa.gov/data/>

I was curious how our site's device split (desktop vs. mobile vs. tablet) compared to the gov't-wide average, so I pulled down the federal data. Attached is the resulting spreadsheet covering the last three months. It's updated every day, so today's file covers Feb. 4 – May 4.

Then I looked at our own Google Analytics.

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Update: Federal AI Personal Assistant Pilot

Greetings Web Content Managers,

I hope all is well and productive where you are. I'm pleased to make an update on our inter-agency communities' Federal AI Personal Assistant Pilot and identify next steps and where needs still exist.

As many of you know, the pilot was launched to test and evaluate public service information integration into consumer-available AI Personal Assistants (IPAs) -- and in the process lay a strong foundation for opening our programs to self-service programs in the home, mobile devices, automobiles and further developed by U.S. businesses.

We hoped to attract a pilot cohort of six agencies with diverse missions and resources, demonstrate practical use cases, and recommend next steps for tackling this emerging field of citizen services. We received more than 6X the declared interest from agencies, who as of this morning continue to reach out to participate (not counting our state, local and international colleagues who have also reached out), and industry partners continue to join the effort, from MITRE to Oracle's Adaptive Intelligent Applications department (in addition to Amazon Alexa, Google Assistant, Microsoft Cortana, and Facebook Messenger's chatbot service.)

It has been nothing short of exciting and overwhelming to discover how many of our missions are primed and ready to move into this space with clear purpose and resources -- enough so that this effort will most certainly not only become a permanent presence, but will look forward and outward to expanding in complexity and scope thanks to the determined contributions of innovators and stewards like yourself.

But first thing is first -- we need to get this initial pilot phase done and in the books. I've seen things this week, pretty incredible new program management services built based on ideas from the pilot, that I didn't think we'd see created until much later phases. As of today we are freezing new entries into the pilot, streamlining the number of concepts down to those ready to advance, and moving on so we can begin the work of institutionalizing this experience for all our colleagues and partners who want to take advantage. There will be plenty more where this came from.

Here's what you can do:

- Visit the Federal AI Personal Assistant Pilot wiki on Github
- Review participating concepts and agencies
- Please email me your Github user name and " #PilotUsername " in the subject if:

- your agency has a participating concept
- has a placeholder page but hasn't expanded their concept yet (if not, they may be paused from the pilot til a later time)
- your agency is not listed but you can help suggest improvements in concepts or resources
- Register for our hackathon for the AI Personal Assistant Pilot, Wednesday May 17
  - Participating concepts will be expected to prepare their projects as much as they can in advance of the hackathon along with the cohort community
  - Specialists from both federal agencies and the innovative platforms opened in the pilot will be present to help tie loose ends and answer questions
  - Attendees do not need to be present the entire day -- they need to be present as little or long as they need to complete their pilot concepts.
  - I'm told a robot will be there. So there's also that.

Next week we are analyzing compliance considerations for this emerging field, and finalizing the combination of business cases and available data.

Thanks again to all of you who stepped forward and proved that the federal government is not only open to emerging citizen technologies, not only ready to test -- we are ready and determined to work together across agencies and with innovative U.S. businesses and startups to make the benefits of tomorrow a real and responsive service for citizens today.

Best regards,
Justin

I'm interested by your tablet statistic. It would seem that tablets would be at a greater percentage than desktops based on my observations of other user stats.

That is interesting data.

Hi everyone.

I was just poking around <https://analytics.usa.gov/> < Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/> > and discovered the data page: <https://analytics.usa.gov/data/> < Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/data/> >

I was curious how our site's device split (desktop vs. mobile vs. tablet) compared to the gov't-wide average, so I pulled down the federal data. Attached is the resulting spreadsheet covering the last three months. It's updated every day, so today's file covers Feb. 4 - May 4.

Then I looked at our own Google Analytics.

Here's what I found:

It is true that tablet traffic is declining from a high peak usage a couple of years ago. However, tablet usage should still be in the high-to-mid 30s rather than dropping so low (<5%) if GlobalWebIndex is correct.

I agree. Depending on the ease of the task, I often prefer to quickly complete it on my smartphone rather than fire up the desktop.

However, I noticed that I am doing more and more on my Kindle Fire including some code editing.

William,

I'm a lurker on the list. I think mobile use is highly dependent on the audience, nature of the information the website provides and the mobile friendliness of the website. For www.uspto.gov: we run just under 80% desktop. It's been coming down over the years, but not as quickly as industry average.

I agree with David. The amount of traffic a website gets from mobile and/or tablet, I believe, depends largely on the type of content you serve, not the quality of the content.

Our www.nist.gov site is mostly desktop users. We launched a responsive, mobile friendly, site late last year but the numbers haven't really changed much. But maybe, given some more time, it will. We'll have to wait and see.

2017 to date:
Desktop = 81%
Mobile = 16%
Tablet = 3%

2016 (after the switch to the new Drupal responsive site):
Desktop = 79%
Mobile = 17%
Tablet = 3%

2016 (January - September - before the switch to the responsive site):
Desktop = 83%
Mobile = 14%
Tablet = 3%

I agree. Depending on the ease of the task, I often prefer to quickly complete it on my smartphone rather than fire up the desktop.

However, I noticed that I am doing more and more on my Kindle Fire including some code editing.

William,

I'm a lurker on the list. I think mobile use is highly dependent on the audience, nature of the information the website provides and the mobile friendliness of the website. For www.uspto.gov: we run just under 80% desktop. It's been coming down over the years, but not a quickly as industry average.

Fair point. Frankly, I do find the usage statistics a bit mixed. Take this article:
<http://www.smartinsights.com/mobile-marketing/mobile-marketing-analytics/mobile-marketing-statistics/>

Yes, tablet (and desktop) usage is declining. However, conversion rates are higher for desktop and tablets than smartphones according to the same analysis. So, are people just browsing on the smartphones and then waiting until they are at a desktop/tablet to engage the site?

All opinions are my own and do not reflect the opinions of my agency.

I would posit that GlobalWebIndex is not "correct" in that it isn't measuring the same thing. Their results stem from the question "In the past month, on which of the following devices have you accessed the internet," which doesn't take into account how often any particular device is used. It's not directly comparable to web analytics.

It is true that tablet traffic is declining from a high peak usage a couple of years ago. However, tablet usage should still be in the high-to-mid 30s rather than dropping so low (<5%) if GlobalWebIndex is correct.

Hi everyone.

I was just poking around Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/> < Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/> > and discovered the data page: Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/data/> < Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/data/> >

I was curious how our site's device split (desktop vs. mobile vs. tablet) compared to the gov't-wide average, so I pulled down the federal data. Attached is the resulting spreadsheet covering the last three months. It's updated every day, so today's file covers Feb. 4 - May 4.

Then I looked at our own Google Analytics.

Here's what I found:

With government websites, it's rare to see a high percentage of tablet usage. This does not necessarily conflict with overall tablet usage rates, though. Device usage varies heavily depending on variables like task and time-of-day. Tablet usage surges after working hours, as not many users bring these devices to work or use them during working hours. There are many other variables as well, but we can't expect the aggregate device category distribution to match our individual sites.

Thanks.

I so not think there was ever a time that VA websites and public facing applications were above 10% tablet usage with the past year being just under 8%. As others have seen, mobile usage has grown and is now close 30%. These numbers exclude internal traffic which pushes the desktop numbers higher.

Hi everyone.

I was just poking around Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/> < Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/> > and discovered the data page: Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/data/> < Caution-<https://analytics.usa.gov/data/> >

I was curious how our site's device split (desktop vs. mobile vs. tablet) compared to the gov't-wide average, so I pulled down the federal data. Attached is the resulting spreadsheet covering the last three months. It's updated every day, so today's file covers Feb. 4 - May 4.

Then I looked at our own Google Analytics.

Here's what I found:

I do not think there was ever a time when tablet usage exceeded 10% for VA websites. Ove the past year, tablet traffic accounted for just under 8% of the total. As others have seen, mobile usage has grown, and is now close 30%. These numbers exclude internal traffic which pushes the desktop numbers higher.

It is true that tablet traffic is declining from a high peak usage a couple of years ago. However, tablet usage should still be in the high-to-mid 30s rather than dropping so low (<5%) if GlobalWebIndex is correct.

I've seen this topic before, but not seen much on it. Govdelivery is a bit pricey for us given how small we are and that we don't take full advantage of all of its features.

Does anyone else use JangoMail? Or have you done any research on it?

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Anyone using a public website for employee communications?

Happy Friday!

Quick question – I’m wondering if there are any agencies out there that are using a public website (.gov website available to the general public) for internal employee communications. In short, does anyone have any experience with providing “intranet”-type content as a section of their public .gov website (or separate website).

We’re trying to address an issue here at DHS where a significant portion of our workforce can’t access our intranet site for employee communications because the site is available only when logged into the DHS network (and they don’t have regular access – think TSA and CBP officers in the field)... wondering if anyone has any experience that they can share.

Thanks!

I don't agree with the overgeneralizations about the generations – really stretching the point to fit the clickbait "Marcia, Marcia, Marcia" title.

However, I do like the concepts of the personal learning ecosystem and the enterprise learning ecosystem. Those should have been the focus of the paper.

I'm looking for recommendations on an online resource where multiple people easily interact with uploaded images in a whiteboard-type environment. Not just see the art but interact with it as well. I'm developing floor plans and would like to give others the opportunity to interact with the designs. Move walls, change room numbers, etc. Does anyone know of such a resource with federal-approved TOS?

Thanks!

We do have some limited employee facing content on our public site, also because it is not always easy or consistent to get to everyone internally. There was also some info (like benefits, timekeeping) that was useful for employees to have access to at home easily. We are in the process of migrating to an internal site platform that will help this, but in the meantime, we DID add content to the public site so everyone could access and put it into its own Service Category grouping. Hope that helps!

Quick question – I’m wondering if there are any agencies out there that are using a public website (.gov website available to the general public) for internal employee communications. Sorry to jump in so late. The solution to your problem will be largely dependent upon the communication needs. Is it purely social media, where employees are communicating anything on their minds? In which case a site like Govloop might be appropriate (public but more focused audience) or a restricted access Facebook site. Is it more of a collaborative need? In which case maybe OMB's MAX site may work really well. If there are concerns about controlling public access to the communication, you may be able to create a public facing SharePoint site attached to the existing public facing agency site, where employees must use credentials to access, but the security is more relaxed.

Good morning!

As a result of a recent DigitalGov user interview, we're compiling a resource about agencies' distance learning programs and want to hear from anyone running such programs. We'd like to know any lessons learned, tips, etc., to prevent others from starting from scratch.

Please email me off list, thanks!

And if you'd like to participate in a user interview for DigitalGov, let me know. We want to find out more about your pain points and hurdles so we can update our offerings.

Thanks,

I apologize if this has already been asked or exists somewhere...but, has research been conducted and aggregated within the federal space on what web content management systems technologies are currently in-use and at which agency (government-wide)? Seems like this sort of market research would be pretty handy for folks to have or know about.

Hi Donovan,
 Here is a list maintained on DigitalGov, but it seems a little outdated. (Looks like Andrea beat me to this bit.)

Ben Balter also wrote some software and did an analysis back in 2011, but the site with the data is no longer available online. His blog post is still available and the software still published, plus it was used as the basis for <https://github.com/dhs-ncats/pshtt> which is what powers <https://pulse.cio.gov>.

Howdy -

I apologize if this has already been asked or exists somewhere...but, has research been conducted and aggregated within the federal space on what web content management systems technologies are currently in-use and at which agency (government-wide)? Seems like this sort of market research would be pretty handy for folks to have or know about.

Greetings Letha Strothers,

Many good replies before mine. I'm happy to seem someone interested in the basics and not a application. There's hope yet ....

Years ago, I struggled to learn about web pages. I tried many avenues, and I suspect, I have a developed an uncommon philosophy about learning about a web page.

Question 1: Does "good FREE or inexpensive resource for really basic HTML" exclude CSS?

I believe in Eric Meyer's earlier books for beginners. Try and find -

- * <http://www.ericmeyeroncss.com/> - Eric Meyer on CSS, and
- * <http://more.ericmeyeroncss.com/> - More Eric Meyer on CSS

I'm not really up with a lot of new stuff nowadays, some I can't even spell correctly, but I believe 'learning HTML primarily without CSS selectors' or 'learning CSS primarily without learning HTML block|inline', is not worth it. In that case, just use a ready-made content management system exclusively in the GUI and raise your tolerance coefficient.

If you are learning HTML, I suggest an early introduction to a page with no CSS. Do it in Notepad, or some plain text editor, and save it as UTF8. Then, open it in different web browsers. Then interweave the introduction of HTML elements and CSS selectors, allowing one to see the relationship of the developing formats. Ask them to make changes, and watch it break. Take a look at the options to UTF8. Why are there options?

Question 2: Where will "recognize codes and do minor edits within code" happen?

This is a Who question.

If your students are typists and not the subject-matter-expert/authoring-environment-user, it may not be worth the time. In my experience, over the last 20 years, less and less of the upstream people have learned enough of the digital writing process to guide the boots-on-the-ground. The upstream people make all the difference, especially if they are not the students.

Question 3: Are students to be page-based or site-based?

In my experience, "learning HTML" had always presented every browser as the same on every web page, or every change in the web page made a difference in the page on the web.

Page-based is user-friendly. Site-based is technical, or less just say more wordy. Don't be afraid to expose your students and their mentors to the real world. Some apparently really simple stuff is hard or inconsistent across the internet's interface. Maybe it's changed, but one fine example would be hanging-indent.

Enough said. A worthy effort.

Good luck,

Hi Letha,

My local public library website offers its members free access to courses at Lynda.com. I've not taken this course, but Lynda has a nearly 6 hour HTML Essential Training course (<https://www.lynda.com/Web-Development-tutorials/HTML-Essential-Training/170427-2.html>).

Overall, it may be overkill but, I suspect the first 5 chapters may contain all your team needs, if your local public library offers its members a similar service.

Hope this helps,

Hi there and to piggy back off of Andrea, do you have similar info for hosting platforms and the accreditation standards adherence by agencies.

I recently discovered the BUILTWITH. Want to know an agencies "Technology" profile (i.e., CMS , hosting provider, IT framework)? Search the dot gov agency web address to find out at <https://builtwith.com>.

Good luck.

Seems like this sort of market research would be pretty handy for folks to have or know about.

Hello all

Actually, if you have a DC Library card, you can do Lynda.com training for free; see work & residency requirements below.

1) Apply for new DC Library card

Here's their location map: <https://www.dclibrary.org/hours-locations>

Who can get a card?

Anyone who resides, works, pays property taxes, or attends school in the District of Columbia can get a card.

Library cards expire after three years. Library cards can only be renewed in person at any DC Public Library branch.

We ask you to renew in person to make sure that we have all of your current contact information.

If you are a resident of one of the following MD / VA counties or cities you can get a DC Public Library Card for free:

Maryland

- Montgomery
- Prince George's

Virginia

- Fairfax
- Loudoun
- Arlington
- Prince William
- Falls Church
- Alexandria
- Frederick

If you live elsewhere, you may apply for a regular library card by visiting any library location in person. The cost is $20, and the card is good for one year.

What do I need to get a card?

Adults must present two current forms of traceable identification, one to prove identity and one to prove place of residence. Examples include:

- driver's license
- rent receipt
- utility bill
- bank book
- apartment lease
- letter on letterhead from a shelter

We also ask for your e-mail address, which is used to provide you with library information ONLY, including notice of items on hold or due, and information about library services and activities.

More info / Apply online / Download PDF application to bring to a branch:
<http://www.dclibrary.org/getacard>

2) Lynda.com login options:

You will need your DC Library Card number and PIN to log in (reset PIN page)

- <https://www.lynda.com/portal/sip?org=dclibrary.org>

Subject: Ever Wanted to make it to Drupal GovCon but there's no travel funds?

We might be able to help. <https://www.drupalgovcon.org/scholarships>

We all know gov travel dollars are minimal at best from local to state to fed and even our international government orgs, it's just not a budget priority, making come out to DC to attend Drupal GovCon nearly impossible. Trust us, we understand.

BUT – we have Travel Awards!!!

Drupal4Gov is able to offer a few scholarships to cover travel costs to Drupal GovCon so that we can get more folks from out of town to the conference. You have to agree to volunteer some time supporting the conference, but we always work with volunteers to maximize their ability to get to the sessions and/or training they want to attend.

The conference is free. We have 3 full days of sessions as well as FREE training each day. It's the kind of training that would cost you hundreds of dollars to attend. We'll be announcing the training courses in the next few weeks. Drupal GovCon is the leading Government Drupal event hosted anywhere in the world. We've had govies from Paraguay, Nigeria, Hennepin County, Boulder Colorado, state universities, Canada, UK, even the great State of Missouri among attendees.

Conference is Mon-Wed at NIH in Bethesda, MD. Jul 31 – Aug 2.

Scholarship info and link to form is at:
<https://www.drupalgovcon.org/scholarships>

DC folks – you should register! It's free!!!
<https://www.drupalgovcon.org/ticket-info>

Just a reminder, we're a volunteer lead organization, funding for scholarships comes from previous hold over funds from previous events. We earmark money left over from past years to make travel awards possible. We also work hard all year round to create programming that can help all of us succeed in our day to day jobs. It's a labor of love for the entire 34 member volunteer planning committee. And you're welcome to volunteer for the event or even for next year's committee!

Volunteering is fun and hopefully rewarding. So, want to volunteer, let us know: <https://www.drupalgovcon.org/get-involved>

Thanks.

What do I need to get a card?

Adults must present two current forms of traceable identification, one to prove identity and one to prove place of residence. Examples include:

- driver's license
- rent receipt
- utility bill
- bank book
- apartment lease

Hi Letha,

My local public library website offers its members free access to courses at Lynda.com. I've not taken this course, but Lynda has a nearly 6 hour HTML Essential Training course (<https://www.lynda.com/Web-Development-tutorials/HTML-Essential-Training/170427-2.html>).

Overall, it may be overkill but, I suspect the first 5 chapters may contain all your team needs, if your local public library offers its members a similar service.

Hope this helps,

Hello, I was asked if a group can use a superscripted character into their web product name, for example as Quick<sup>3</sup> for a 'Quick3' with the 3 as superscript. This would appear in <title> and <body> of all pages in the microsite.

Do you know specific reasons not to do this, risks of doing it, etc.? Authoritative resources about it?

Hi Dan, there's almost no discussion of how superscript affects SEO, generally, but a fair amount of discussion from a number of years ago about how <title> tags don't like inline styles. Have you tried it yet? For general search, not necessarily titles, in my experience, Google strips non-text characters - a search for "word1 word2" can contain results for "word1, word2" and "word1_word2" as well. They appear to use the stripped version for search and the original for display, leaving formatting tags (b, i, sup, etc.) out of their snippets. You'd want to experiment with both <sup> and  including an inline vertical alignment style. I see Wikipedia contains both approaches, for molecule pages, for instance.

Do you have access to Google Search Console (nee Google Webmaster Tools)? If so, you could use their Fetch As Google tool on a page on NLM that already includes superscript, or subscript, to see how they're seeing that code.

The HTML5 specification is the place to go for answers to questions like this. I'm just not sure it gives the answer that I'm pretty sure is supposed to be there.

The title element of a web page is part of the metadata of the page and entails no formatting. Inline styles are irrelevant. The specification says that the content model for the title is "text." (The content model gives us insight into the kind of information the element can contain.)

I was hoping to find a definitive statement that only Unicode characters are allowed when the content model is text. Instead I found this:

"Text, in the context of content models, means either nothing, or Text nodes. Text is sometimes used as a content model on its own, but is also phrasing content, and can be inter-element whitespace (if the Text nodes are empty or contain just space characters).

"Text nodes and attribute values must consist of Unicode characters, must not contain U+0000 characters, must not contain permanently undefined Unicode characters (noncharacters), and must not contain control characters other than space characters. This specification includes extra constraints on the exact value of Text nodes and attribute values depending on their precise context."

That first sentence troubles me—"text" can mean nothing in this context? That is not helpful at all. Although "text node" is not defined, I suspect that the title element is one. If so, then only Unicode characters, not HTML elements or codes or other entries, are allowed as content.

In other words, you may use Quick<sup>3</sup> as the title, but the <, sup, >, and / will be read as text characters, not as components of an HTML tag. In other words, you won't see Quick<sup>3</sup> in the browser tab. You'll see the keystrokes you entered—Quick<sup>3</sup>.

The other potential approach, which is to use the Unicode character for a superscript 3 instead of <sup>3</sup>, won't work, either, because that is actually a U+0000 character. (It's U+00B3.)

To get something that looks like Quick<sup>3</sup> to appear in the browser tab, they could make an image of that text and add that image as their site's favicon. Then the tab would look something like this, where the text with an orange background represents the favicon:

Quick<sup>3</sup> Quick3

In doing this research, I came to realize something else that is kind of interesting:

- <title> is an element of HTML.
- All elements of HTML may have global attributes associated with them.
- One of the global attributes is also called title.
- So <title title="Wrong">Right</title> is actually valid, under the HTML specification.

If you put that in the metadata of your page, what should a screen reader that complies with the specification announce?

The actual answer probably is not as interesting as the question. (Sorry that I couldn't wait until Friday to ask.)

Hi, Everyone.

If you haven't already seen it, The Federal Agency Customer Experience Act of 2017 (S. 1088) is a Senate Bill that would mandate all agencies to use a standardized set of customer satisfaction survey questions that would be developed by OMB/GSA.

I don't know how everyone else feels, but I take great issue with this effort as it would derail all the strategy and work that has gone into developing survey questions specific to our content and users, and negatively impact our current KPI measurement process. Questions specific to top-tasks, audience identification, as well as content-specific questions, would take a back seat to a set of one-size-fits-all questions developed by OMB and GSA.

The bill allows for agencies to add their own questions after the required set, but that's a good way to increase abandonment rates and limit the number of short, effective surveys we can use. Not to mention the sunk costs from the efforts of digital analytics programs and content staff who rely on quality VoC data.

Anyhow, I just stumbled on this and, thankfully, will be getting comments to our legal POCs in time.

I encourage everyone to get a hold of this bill and provide your comments through the appropriate channels at your respective agencies.

This is not like DAP, where you can run your own analytics code side-by-side with the DAP code without any issues; this WILL impact you and your users if it gets mandated!

Thanks.

Sam,

Thanks for sharing your thoughts on this. I read the proposal differently, assuming that this new mandate could be implemented in addition to any existing customer experience analytics techniques we already use to improve the user experience of--and customer satisfaction with--our online offerings.

I see a benefit to this proposal in that parts of the organization that do not systematically collect this type of information (read: non-digital service and information departments) will also be measured.

Please help me understand where this document says we can't do this in addition to existing measurement tools?

Thanks!

Hi, Dana.

I would make two points:

1. How many surveys do you think it is wise to solicit to a given user in a given session? From my perspective, we do not want to overburden users with multiple survey invitations, nor do we want them answering surveys of 10 or more questions. We have run experiments and seen abandonment rates rise with the number of additional questions added, which is why we intentionally keep the number of questions low. Data quality and sample size are critical, and being forced to choose to burden users with multiple surveys or overload a single one with too many questions is not a scenario I see as positive.
2. The bill does not offer an option for those not already collecting feedback; rather, it seems to apply across the board, as outlined in "Sec. 6. Customer Experience Data Collection." Section C reads, "... each covered agency shall collect voluntary feedback across all platforms or channels through which the covered agency interacts with individuals or other entities to deliver information or services ..."

If you take this as an honest effort to make some improvements, you still have to ask why they didn't do any research to what agencies are currently doing. What's working; what's not? How advanced are some of the implementations already in use. What types of analysis are underway and how do certain types of questions and collections methods support those analyses.

As I understand it, not all relevant parties at GSA even saw this one coming.

Sam,

Thanks for sharing your thoughts on this. I read the proposal differently, assuming that this new mandate could be implemented in addition to any existing customer experience analytics techniques we already use to improve the user experience of--and customer satisfaction with--our online offerings.

I see a benefit to this proposal in that parts of the organization that do not systematically collect this type of information (read: non-digital service and information departments) will also be measured.

Please help me understand where this document says we can't do this in addition to existing measurement tools?

Thanks!

Hi, Everyone.

If you haven't already seen it, The Federal Agency Customer Experience Act of 2017 (S. 1088) is a Senate Bill that would mandate all agencies to use a standardized set of customer satisfaction survey questions that would be developed by OMB/GSA.

I don't know how everyone else feels, but I take great issue with this effort as it would derail all the strategy and work that has gone into developing survey questions specific to our content and users, and negatively impact our current KPI measurement process. Questions specific to top-tasks, audience identification, as well as content-specific questions, would take a back seat to a set of one-size-fits-all questions developed by OMB and GSA.

The bill allows for agencies to add their own questions after the required set, but that's a good way to increase abandonment rates and limit the number of short, effective surveys we can use. Not to mention the sunk costs from the efforts of digital analytics programs and content staff who rely on quality VoC data.

Anyhow, I just stumbled on this and, thankfully, will be getting comments to our legal POCs in time.

I encourage everyone to get a hold of this bill and provide your comments through the appropriate channels at your respective agencies.

This is not like DAP, where you can run your own analytics code side-by-side with the DAP code without any issues; this WILL impact you and your users if it gets mandated!

Thanks.

Sam,

I definitely agree it doesn't behoove anyone to have multiple surveys (and, in fact, this proposal says we can only solicit feedback once per interaction). The proposal also states that GSA/OMB will "develop a set of standardized questions for use by covered agencies" (it doesn't say this full set of questions are **required** but perhaps this is implied...I originally read this as essentially a menu of questions we could select from). In addition, agencies can optionally add their own questions. With regards to the number of questions, the proposal is clear that there shouldn't be more than 10. I suppose we'll have to see what GSA/OMB come up with and whether we can pick and choose (and align/merge with what we already do into one survey) or are forced into a one-size-fits-all set of required survey questions that would make it impossible to coordinate with our existing survey methodologies.

To clarify what I meant about the benefit I see to this proposal: I would like to see other parts of my organization collecting customer satisfaction data and this proposal ensures that all channels (not just digital) will be measured by law.

You make very fair points about due diligence regarding existing/best practices as well as consulting the leaders in digital government who are already doing this work. No argument from me! I'm mostly just trying to ascertain how concerned I really need to be about this proposal. I think we all want a measurement strategy that is (a) useful in actually informing improvements to our services; (b) a good user experience; and (c) easy for us to align/merge with our existing practices.

Thanks for the discussion starter!

Best,

Dana

If it's helpful, I've also provided US Code diffs of the changes to the PRA to make it more clear how it changes PRA, but essentially it defines "voluntary feedback" and adds that as an exemption to PRA under 3518(c)(1) - <https://www.law.cornell.edu/uscode/text/44/3518>

Keep in mind, though, that we don't have to wait and see, we can provide comments and concerns at this time.

Sam,

I definitely agree it doesn't behoove anyone to have multiple surveys (and, in fact, this proposal says we can only solicit feedback once per interaction). The proposal also states that GSA/OMB will "develop a set of standardized questions for use by covered agencies" (it doesn't say this full set of questions are *required* but perhaps this is implied...I originally read this as essentially a menu of questions we could select from). In addition, agencies can optionally add their own questions. With regards to the number of questions, the proposal is clear that there shouldn't be more than 10. I suppose we'll have to see what GSA/OMB come up with and whether we can pick and choose (and align/merge with what we already do into one survey) or are forced into a one-size-fits-all set of required survey questions that would make it impossible to coordinate with our existing survey methodologies.

To clarify what I meant about the benefit I see to this proposal: I would like to see other parts of my organization collecting customer satisfaction data and this proposal ensures that all channels (not just digital) will be measured by law.

You make very fair points about due diligence regarding existing/best practices as well as consulting the leaders in digital government who are already doing this work. No argument from me! I'm mostly just trying to ascertain how concerned I really need to be about this proposal. I think we all want a measurement strategy that is (a) useful in actually informing improvements to our services; (b) a good user experience; and (c) easy for us to align/merge with our existing practices.

Thanks for the discussion starter!

Best,

Dana

Hi, Dana.

I would make two points:

1. How many surveys do you think it is wise to solicit to a given user in a given session? From my perspective, we do not want to overburden users with multiple survey invitations, nor do we want them answering surveys of 10 or more questions. We have run experiments and seen abandonment rates rise with the number of additional questions added, which is why we intentionally keep the number of questions low. Data quality and sample size are critical, and being forced to choose to burden users with multiple surveys or overload a single one with too many questions is not a scenario I see as positive.

2. The bill does not offer an option for those not already collecting feedback; rather, it seems to apply across the board, as outlined in “Sec. 6. Customer Experience Data Collection.” Section C reads, “... each covered agency shall collect voluntary feedback across all platforms or channels through which the covered agency interacts with individuals or other entities to deliver information or services ...”

If you take this as an honest effort to make some improvements, you still have to ask why they didn't do any research to what agencies are currently doing. What's working; what's not? How advanced are some of the implementations already in use. What types of analysis are underway and how do certain types of questions and collections methods support those analyses.

As I understand it, not all relevant parties at GSA even saw this one coming.

Sam,

Thanks for sharing your thoughts on this. I read the proposal differently, assuming that this new mandate could be implemented in addition to any existing customer experience analytics techniques we already use to improve the user experience of--and customer satisfaction with--our online offerings.

I see a benefit to this proposal in that parts of the organization that do not systematically collect this type of information (read: non-digital service and information departments) will also be measured.

Please help me understand where this document says we can't do this in addition to existing measurement tools?

Thanks!

Hi, Everyone.

If you haven't already seen it, The Federal Agency Customer Experience Act of 2017 (S. 1088) is a Senate Bill that would mandate all agencies to use a standardized set of customer satisfaction survey questions that would be developed by OMB/GSA.

I don't know how everyone else feels, but I take great issue with this effort as it would derail all the strategy and work that has gone into developing survey questions specific to our content and users, and negatively impact our current KPI measurement process. Questions specific to top-tasks, audience identification, as well as content-specific questions, would take a back seat to a set of one-size-fits-all questions developed by OMB and GSA.

The bill allows for agencies to add their own questions after the required set, but that's a good way to increase abandonment rates and limit the number of short, effective surveys we can use. Not to mention the sunk costs from the efforts of digital analytics programs and content staff who rely on quality VoC data.

Anyhow, I just stumbled on this and, thankfully, will be getting comments to our legal POCs in time.

I encourage everyone to get a hold of this bill and provide your comments through the appropriate channels at your respective agencies.

This is not like DAP, where you can run your own analytics code side-by-side with the DAP code without any issues; this WILL impact you and your users if it gets mandated!

Thanks.

Thanks much. Makes sense to me. Then again, I like maths, eg. the Platonic solids. And there are only five. Known since antiquity. So why? Why only five? And there's never more than six in four dimensions. No "dark" regular polytopes. Somehow somewhere somestuff can be simple.

Hi all,

I'm co-leading the Better Government Program's Content Team with Michelle Ramsden and we need your help! Do you like creating personas and customer journey maps? Then, we've got the micro-detail for you! Complete details at <https://openopps.digitalgov.gov/tasks/641>.

Description:

The Better Government Program is looking for 1-2 UX-savvy innovators this summer! You would support the content team by refining five personas and creating journey maps, which will be used to develop content for the Better Government's Innovation Toolkit. The target deadline is August 15, 2017. The work will involve about 2-4 hours per week and can be done remotely.

The five personas include innovators across all levels of government from senior government executive to new federal employees. The journey maps will represent each persona's experiences with innovation in their government organization.

The Better Government Program helps create a better relationship between government and the public. Learn more about the program at the Better Government Program's GitHub site at <https://github.com/18F/better-government/>.

If you have questions about this opportunity, please contact me at brooke.dine@nih.gov.

Does anyone on this list have a contact at Google who either deals with federal websites, or might be able to answer a question about how their search results quick charts are presented? Just in case someone here might already know the answer to my question, here is the issue:

If you type into Google search "population of [a specific US geography such as 'madison, wi' or 'montgomery county md']" or, alternatively, "[geography] population", you will most of the time get a graph of that place's population over time, with the following footnote: "Sources include: United States Census Bureau." The footnote links to a reference page that has moved. I believe that these graphs are created using a template, or code that builds a template, and that source note is hard-coded in. Some of my colleagues believe that the source note is derived from wherever Google is getting the data. In either case, we need to get Google to fix it, because it is generating 404s.

If you can share a Google contact likely to help, or a definitive solution because you've had a similar issue, I would hugely appreciate it.

Is your agency using content models to create flexible and reusable content? HHS currently has over 20 models—and the list continues to grow. In an effort to promote collaboration and help others use content models, HHS is sharing some of their content models via GitHub (<https://github.com/HHS>).

If you are also using content models, please email the uswebdesignstandards@gsa.gov and share your experiences. We want to know what's worked and what hasn't across government.

Not familiar with content models?

A content model is a representation of types of content and their inter-relationships. Content modeling takes content items and breaks them down into smaller structures, called content types. These content types are defined by their attributes.

Open and structured content models can help you create content that is platform-agnostic, format-free, and device independent. We need to stop creating fixed, single-purpose content and start making it more future-ready, flexible, and reusable. In the age of smartphones, tablets, social media tools, syndication, and websites, the need for modular content is growing.

Hear hear! And the rise of virtual assistants is another reason to start thinking about format-free content.

There's a webinar coming up folks may be interested in, about decoupling content management from presentation: <https://www.fourkitchens.com/knowledge/webinars/the-future-of-the-cms/> - it's interesting to think about designing and writing content once for consumption through multiple interface types.

Hello!

Thank you for sending; I've looked that what HHS does and it is a great idea, but I have two questions:

- 1.) How does one go about actually implementing this across an entire Agency? Who did you work with? Did it cut costs? How did you advocate for it?
- 2.) Has anyone tried this in a classified environment on an internal network – the goal being to push authoritative content to internal customers automatically?

Best,

We will be have at least one session and a key note on this topic at Drupal GovCon July 31-August 2nd.

We're almost sold out for tickets (last I looked we had less than 200 tickets remaining). And it's still a free event.

<https://www.drupalgovcon.org/ticket-info>

And tomorrow, June 9th, the Travel Award (we pay for your travel costs to come out to GovCon) closes. So, if you want to meet other Govies from around the country and some new faces from other countries, try for one of the travel awards.

>> the rise of virtual assistants is another reason to start thinking about format-free content.

Where does the content model initiative need to root and grow? Is it in operations?

I wonder if anyone has tried convincing a content creator to polish their content into a plain text outline, eg. in Notepad. To me, that kind of cooperation requires a breed of the old-fashioned writer. I suspect it grows harder and harder to find those in our networks.

I guess for me, in an information technology services office, it's easy to understand the value of content models. I guess it's like reusable glass jars, or (pause) structured programming or (pause) modular development. Or, content management systems. Or, a brown roux in the kitchen.

But isn't this kind of like trying to get everybodys to write 'good' english? As compared to more pretty-er print?

Seems to me whether its a help-ticket how-to, long-form journalism, a screenplay, a play, or even a silent movie, ground-up enthusiasm can really help. Compared to top-down creativity. Even if it's modern, cool, and cloudy.

I wonder what "out of context" means in content models. Could that be satire? Or is it a hack?

Happy Thursday.

Howdy, folks.

In working with the Digital Analytics Program (DAP), we assembled a number of open source datasets to assemble a list of federal website subdomains to help better visual the federal web presence. We've had a list of .gov websites for a number of years now, but that just included www.agencyx.gov not blog.agencyx.gov, calendar.agencyx.gov, etc.

You can read more in Tim's email to the DAP points of contact a few weeks ago (below), checkout the methodology here, or go straight to the main results here.

Whether for your agency or any wider .gov analysis you want to do, I hope its useful.

Gray B.

Subject: Tracking DAP on Subdomains

Hi DAP POCs:

In working with you all over the last few months, we've gotten quite a few inquiries about methods to track DAP adoption across subdomains. While pulse.cio.gov is currently only offering tracking on second-level domains for DAP implementation, my GSA colleague Gray Brooks has generously spent some time putting together a resource that we hope will be helpful to you.

As you'll see in the documentation in the README, subdomains were gathered from various publicly accessible sources, combined, de-duped, cleared of redirects, and cleaned with a far-from-perfect "ignore" list (that was created by human eyes scanning the list) designed to remove some staging/test environments. Then we ran that list against a report from DAP itself.

The resulting file is our best approximation at DAP tracking on subdomains across government. It's a snapshot in time and is not a perfect resource, but we thought it might assist you all as a guide. It might also help you identify subdomains you were previously unaware of.

Please note the following:

1. We're sure this is not an exhaustive list of subdomains, but it's what we could gather from public sources.
2. The ignore list was created by human eye, and is just a way to remove some known culprits for non-public sites (e.g. staging.agency.gov, uat.agency.gov, etc). There are still plenty of hostnames in the list that may not resolve or are behind firewalls.

Many thanks to Gray Brooks for his effort in making this happen and meticulously documenting the steps he took to arrive at the final list. We hope that you all find it useful for your own recordkeeping. In the coming days, we plan on sharing this project on some of the other listserves so that folks can self-identify domains and reach out to us, as well.

Please let us know if you feel this is a helpful resource. We'd love to hear your comments!

Best,

Tim

I'm researching federal licensing of Adobe Creative Cloud and am looking for procurement vehicles through which we might obtain licenses at rates lower than those quoted at retail. If you're using CC, could you please help by sharing 1) how many people in your agency use it, 2) do you have individual accounts or do you have multiple licenses, and 3) did you obtain it through a larger contract and, if so, which one? I'm a creative, not procurement, so my grasp of this stuff is tenuous at best but I seem to remember that there were contracts out there for this sort of thing. Any advice would be appreciated!

Here at DOI our Office of Chief Information Officer (OCIO) went through procurement and secured a BPA with a company that provided license agreements with Adobe for their entire software catalog. The prices were far less than what you would pay for retail. They came on a 12,6,3 months 1st year sliding pay, with year two being a fixed price. Doing a BPA might be your best course of action if you have many users on Adobe within FEC. If only a few, then perhaps retail may be more cost effective. Work with your CIO and Procurement office.

Good morning,
DOJ is considering acquiring an app that will provide real time arrival and departure schedules for the shuttle buses that move employees between 10 or so buildings in downtown DC.

Are any of you aware of a reasonably priced COTS products that would do this?

Could you look into adding it to one or several of the myriad of apps that are out there already. My local transit system in the Raleigh/Durham/Chapel Hill area of NC uses Transloc and Rider on my iPhone. Transloc has a list of scores of university and town systems in its list.

Alas, it also advises that it needs to be updated, as it will "not work in future versions of the OS."

Anyway – I suspect there are several choices out there. I like the way Transloc works. Rider shows next bus, I think.

I used to work for American University, and we had a system in place that showed the busses on a map. It used a GPS tracker inside the bus to relay that info. It was several years ago, so I dug up their recent page: <http://bus.streeteagleweb.com/BusViewer.aspx>. It appears to be using something called Smart Traxx – here’s their app: <https://play.google.com/store/apps/details?id=com.insight.smarttraxx&hl=en>

Given that universities are running small bus systems similar to yours on small-ish budgets, it might be worth investigating what universities are using.

Cathy, you might want to check with NIH Office of Research Services <https://www.ors.od.nih.gov/pes/dats/NIHShuttleServices/Pages/shuttle.aspx>. Midpage, there's information on its "GPS-based arrival time Information"
The National Cancer Institute seems to use a separate service for its Shady Grove Shuttle and for its NCI-Frederick location. Contact information is on that same page.

Could you look into adding it to one or several of the myriad of apps that are out there already. My local transit system in the Raleigh/Durham/Chapel Hill area of NC uses Transloc and Rider on my iPhone. Transloc has a list of scores of university and town systems in its list.

Alas, it also advises that it needs to be updated, as it will "not work in future versions of the OS."

Anyway – I suspect there are several choices out there. I like the way Transloc works. Rider shows next bus, I think.

Good afternoon,
DON is considering using Google Analytics (free version) for collecting site information for some of our "private" systems - that is to say our systems that run on non-classified web but are behind controlled access. I'm looking for some help in understanding:
The security implications? can they be mitigated?
Is there another free solution?
Is this just a really bad idea?

Does an enterprise version of google analytics allow for mitigation?

Hi everyone,

At USA.gov/GobiernoUSA.gov, we're looking at ways we can make sure we're providing our users with the most accurate, up-to-date information and answers to their government questions.

To that end, we're trying to gather some information about what capabilities you might have in terms of API/content syndication/content sharing.

If you have a few minutes and could answer a couple of questions about that, we'd really appreciate it.

Good morning,

We are implementing the Saba online learning management system in our county to offering trainings to residents, volunteers, and business partners, etc. I am interested in feedback from other government agencies who've deployed Saba to external customers.

I'd like to know:

- how you structured your domains in relation to your lines of business, e.g., a single landing page for your entire agency or unique pages for each line of business
- the user experience from the department's perspective on uploading and configuring courses and the catalog(s)
- the user experience from the trainee's perspective in accessing and completing courses
- whether you created a governance structure to manage delivery of online learning.

Thanks!

Hi all,

A few folks pointed out that the survey had some strange permissions going on. I think I've corrected that now, so I apologize for that!

Thanks for those of you who let me know!

Subject: How long does it take for web changes to show up?

Hi everyone.

In the old days, we'd edit a page, hit upload, and the change was visible immediately.

In today's world, though, there's the concept of caching, with distribution networks checking for new versions of pages after X time, so it can take up to X for changes to appear unless you manually force a cache refresh. These are caches on Internet servers, which store copies of websites in the cloud and are what you actually see when you visit a site instead of the "home server" for that site. I'm not talking about caches within a particular person's browser.

For example, our cache refresh time is an hour (aka "time to live," with that last word being the last part of "alive," as opposed to rhyming with "give"). That is, Akamai pulls a new copy of each existing page once/hour. No matter what, changes will show up within an hour, but it can vary from almost instantly to the full hour. I believe that if you save a new version 1 minute after the cache refresh, it'll take 59 minutes for the new version to get pulled and made visible. In contrast, if you save it 58 minutes after a cache refresh, that new version will show up after only 2 minutes. Again, not accounting for our ability to force a cache refresh manually.

My understanding is that how frequently you have cache refreshes is based partly on a cost tradeoff: more frequent pulls cost more.

All of which brings me to my actual question: for those of you using Akamai and other distribution networks, what's your cache refresh schedule?

Thanks!

Hi [REDACTED]

For "news" content, I've found it helpful to have my CMS trigger a CDN cache refresh for the edited page, immediately after publication. That usually means <1 or 2 minutes to public-visible. Home pages, list pages and other pages that wouldn't naturally "know" that they'd been edited require a bit of extra effort, but it's worth the trouble to do so.

At EPA, if you *publish* a page, that forces a cache refresh for that path. That little bit of functionality right there allows us to set a long TTL:

- 24 hours at Akamai (with some exceptions)
- 48 hours for Boost (a Drupal "static page builder" module)

Both caches are cleared for the specific path when a page is republished. We would set the TTLs even higher if our site was less dynamic—there are elements of our site that incorporate views (like Larry's site does) that don't "know" they've been updated, so they sit there, cached.

We have the ability to adjust the TTLs higher if we're hit with a significant surge of traffic.

(Boost allows us to generate and then save the requested page on our server. We give that page to the 1,000s of Akamai servers that don't yet have the page in their caches, should they request a copy. Delivering already generated pages is much easier than regenerating from scratch.)

Akamai now offers "Fast Purge" (v3 of their Cache Clearing Utility API), and we've incorporated that into our application. Fast Purge is supposed to take seconds to refresh (it's hard to measure). V2 of their purging API took up to 7 minutes. This API is what we use when a page is republished.

Austin,

Asking for friend. What’s our version of this? I think – when we publish, old pages are simply overwritten, so every request gets the latest version. There’s no automated check-and-update, correct? At least, I’ve never seen an old version of a page more than the 7 minutes that publishing can take.

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] How long does it take for web changes to show up?

Hi everyone.

In the old days, we'd edit a page, hit upload, and the change was visible immediately.

In today's world, though, there's the concept of caching, with distribution networks checking for new versions of pages after X time, so it can take up to X for changes to appear unless you manually force a cache refresh. These are caches on Internet servers, which store copies of websites in the cloud and are what you actually see when you visit a site instead of the "home server" for that site. I'm not talking about caches within a particular person's browser.

For example, our cache refresh time is an hour (aka "time to live," with that last word being the last part of "alive," as opposed to rhyming with "give"). That is, Akamai pulls a new copy of each existing page once/hour. No matter what, changes will show up within an hour, but it can vary from almost instantly to the full hour. I believe that if you save a new version 1 minute after the cache refresh, it'll take 59 minutes for the new version to get pulled and made visible. In contrast, if you save it 58 minutes after a cache refresh, that new version will show up after only 2 minutes. Again, not accounting for our ability to force a cache refresh manually.

My understanding is that how frequently you have cache refreshes is based partly on a cost tradeoff: more frequent pulls cost more.

All of which brings me to my actual question: for those of you using Akamai and other distribution networks, what's your cache refresh schedule?

Thanks!

Thank you again William Brantley.

I noted the discipline in the page titles which I presume carried over into breadcrumbs and filenames. I approve.

{ {Taxonomy} + {Navigation} + {User journey} } <= very good.

The implied dynamic "User journey" is a more utilitarian description than the static "user interface". I approve.

I think many times a content provider focuses only on the current page in play, and disregards that's page's place in the internet of things. (Sorry. I couldn't resist.)

I see that gov.uk employs "<aside>". But I did see use of "<section>". I wonder why not?

I think having both  and <section> in HTML 5 was a real good thing.

The pages render fast. Maybe it's not DHTML.

My two cents.

Hi (b) (6), (b) (7)(C)

My tradeoff is performance, not cost.

So, say for instance my editors make a change to a page. The regular Drupal cache is cleared (you can purge it with contrib modules), I clear the cache on the servers and then get my New Relic notice about slow load times. Slow for our site. I have Akamai set to hourly updates and pages cached at the edge are at 1/2 day. This means Akamai doesn't go back to the origin server to get the next changed page for half a day, but does refresh to look for new content every 6 minutes. That Half Day refresh is pulling the entire site, all the updated content everywhere from videos to images to words. Even when it's not a main page, but one buried deep in the site which happens occasionally when we need to correct typos and the like.

Hope I've explained it well here.

For me, the settings are based on performance. I don't want that full scan running every 10 minutes. For one thing, it's not necessary and for another, I can tell when it's kicked off because I get a New Relic performance email telling me the site is slow. It's like a thousand web crawlers reading your site all at once only, you did it to yourself. So, I try to minimize that pain. I will also point out we update content daily, often multiple times a day. So these settings work for us based on our individualized needs, which is the beauty of having MaxCDN, Akamai or similar. I also have to say the UI for MaxCDN is way easier than the Luna control panel with Akamai, took me forever to figure out how to upload the cert, how to purge cache (which I need to do occasionally) and how to set up the 12 hour and 6 minute cycles.

Happy to talk more about my set up, just ping me if you do.

And I really gotta look into Michael's set up with some new Akamai API cause that would make my 12 hour cycle way longer and mean that I could drop the 6 minute and just go with the api kicking it off. Adding it to my white board now!

Hi (b) (6), (b) (7)(C)

My tradeoff is performance, not cost.

So, say for instance my editors make a change to a page. The regular Drupal cache is cleared (you can purge it with contrib modules), I clear the cache on the servers and then get my New Relic notice about slow load times. Slow for our site. I have Akamai set to hourly updates and pages cached at the edge are at 1/2 day. This means Akamai doesn't go back to the origin server to get the next changed page for half a day, but does refresh to look for new content every 6 minutes. That Half Day refresh is pulling the entire site, all the updated content everywhere from videos to images to words. Even when it's not a main page, but one buried deep in the site which happens occasionally when we need to correct typos and the like.

Hope I've explained it well here.

For me, the settings are based on performance. I don't want that full scan running every 10 minutes. For one thing, it's not necessary and for another, I can tell when it's kicked off because I get a New Relic performance email telling me the site is slow. It's like a thousand web crawlers reading your site all at once only, you did it to yourself. So, I try to minimize that pain. I will also point out we update content daily, often multiple times a day. So these settings work for us based on our individualized needs, which is the beauty of having MaxCDN, Akamai or similar. I also have to say the UI for MaxCDN is way easier than the Luna control panel with Akamai, took me forever to figure out how to upload the cert, how to purge cache (which I need to do occasionally) and how to set up the 12 hour and 6 minute cycles.

Happy to talk more about my set up, just ping me if you do.

And I really gotta look into Michael's set up with some new Akamai API cause that would make my 12 hour cycle way longer and mean that I could drop the 6 minute and just go with the api kicking it off. Adding it to my white board now!

Austin,

Asking for friend. What's our version of this? I think – when we publish, old pages are simply overwritten, so every request gets the latest version. There's no automated check-and-update, correct? At least, I've never seen an old version of a page more than the 7 minutes that publishing can take.

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] How long does it take for web changes to show up?

Hi everyone.

In the old days, we'd edit a page, hit upload, and the change was visible immediately.

In today's world, though, there's the concept of caching, with distribution networks checking for new versions of pages after X time, so it can take up to X for changes to appear unless you manually force a cache refresh. These are caches on Internet servers, which store copies of websites in the cloud and are what you actually see when you visit a site instead of the "home server" for that site. I'm not talking about caches within a particular person's browser.

For example, our cache refresh time is an hour (aka "time to live," with that last word being the last part of "alive," as opposed to rhyming with "give"). That is, Akamai pulls a new copy of each existing page once/hour. No matter what, changes will show up within an hour, but it can vary from almost instantly to the full hour. I believe that if you save a new version 1 minute after the cache refresh, it'll take 59 minutes for the new version to get pulled and made visible. In contrast, if you save it 58 minutes after a cache refresh, that new version will show up after only 2 minutes. Again, not accounting for our ability to force a cache refresh manually.

My understanding is that how frequently you have cache refreshes is based partly on a cost tradeoff: more frequent pulls cost more.

All of which brings me to my actual question: for those of you using Akamai and other distribution networks, what's your cache refresh schedule?

Thanks!

I especially like this piece of advice:

"Make sure your participants aren't all coders.

It's important to involve non-coders, especially stakeholders, to ensure that products address civic priorities and are accessible to less tech-savvy residents. Collaboration between developers and stakeholders also promotes understanding between builders and users of tools for government, improving opportunities for future co-production."

Dear colleagues,

Hope you had a wonderful 4th of July Holiday and my apologies for those who are receiving this message twice - sharing with a couple of listservs.

Any government employee knows first hand the importance of communicating with the audience they need to serve. But when they encounter limited English proficient individuals, communication can be difficult or non-existent. Enter the Language Map App developed by the Department of Justice. With this App, you can determine in minutes if there are LEP individuals in your county, state, municipality and which language(s) they speak.

Register for the webinar to take place on July 20th and join our DOJ colleagues as they demonstrate the Language Map App. The App will help you assess the language needs of your LEP population to more effectively reach them.

Hope to see you there!

Thanks,

Hi everyone!

I'm actually the 'build a building' type of Architect/Project Manager (currently a new Courthouse) and somehow joined this group. Your world and learning things are of great interest - especially as books and ink blotters are transitioning into mice and monitors and the facilities to support them rapidly evolve. So, with regard to these posts, I am mostly listening on the sidelines...

However, now I'm trying to help my friend Doug, an Operations Manager at GSA, with his Customer Service Announcements. He/they can't seem to control the typeface and point size. Below my contact info is a recently received announcement. The important part is the tiny 7pt type.

I request your help! How can they fix their set-up to make these Announcements work better graphically?

I've copied (b) (6) - please feel free to communicate with him directly.

Many thanks,

Hello,

Please disseminate this message.

GSA's Fire Safety contractor will be on site to test our Fire Protection System on 7/10 and 7/11.

The testing hopefully will not impact anyone as we've scheduled the testing of horns and strobes for 6:00 am on 7/11; however, we apologize in advance for any inconvenience this causes.

Should you have any questions or concerns, please feel free to contact the Customer Service Desk.

Hey folks,

I'm boosting the signal here – I announced this on a smaller list just before the 4th of July holidays, and I don't want this opportunity to get lost in the post-vacation email-o-lanches we all end up with! The detail is to get a Drupal / PHP person in to help me finish off a Drupal 8 website redesign.

ME & NTSB & THE PROJECT

For those not in the know, "the National Transportation Safety Board is an independent Federal agency charged by Congress with investigating every civil aviation accident the United States and significant accidents in other modes of transportation – railroad, highway, marine and pipeline. The NTSB determines the probable cause of the accidents and issues safety recommendations aimed at preventing future accidents."

We are a small agency, HQ in DC (conveniently right above the L'Enfant Plaza Metro), with a big mission. I run the Digital Services shop within our office of Safety Recommendations & Communications, and my staff (of 3) are responsible for web, graphics/publications, audio/visual, and general social media oversight. As for my background, I've done most everything IT and web related along the way (programming site functionality and CMSs included), but I'm not by any stretch very savvy with php / Drupal. (<https://www.linkedin.com/in/jmathieson/> for anyone interested)

And I want to do this right.

The project is a shiny new D8 ntsb.gov, which has been completely redesigned and redeveloped to focus on the accident investigation as a core of the site (things are scattered on the current site, which is also dated in look). The funding I had went a long way to gathering requirements, delving into the what and how and why of things, but unfortunately ran out before the complete functional site was built (so there's a punch list of features / functions to build out).

It's a great opportunity to help build a customer-focused Drupal site, using D8 to boot.

YOU

Drupal guru with experience on the backend of the system, know how to mod all the code bits, set up the views, build the functionality on the page, and basically make it all work properly / stop me from suggesting the impossible.

Sense of humor and thirst for adventure a bonus.

Willing / able to come over for a detail for [TBD] time - I'm hoping our agencies could agree to an 120 day detail, so there's time to really do this and not be rushed. But that's TBD between our agencies.

THE PROCESS

If you are interested (and feel free to send out to other fed drupal folks who are not on the list), please send me a message at james.mathieson@ntsb.gov expressing interest. Please do include a description of your drupal experience and projects you have worked on.

I'll contact people to set up a time to talk in person, and hopefully be able to show what we've already built. Once I'm lucky enough to get one of you to agree, I'll work through the process of the MOU between our agencies for the detail.

One caveat up front, due to budget constraints, NTSB couldn't pick up the tab, so this would very probably be a non-reimbursable detail for your agency. (I imagine that won't be a shock to most agencies, though.)

Please feel free to contact me with any questions you have.

Cheers,
James

Dear colleagues,

Only one week left to register for the Language Map App Webinar!!

Any government employee knows first hand the importance of communicating with the audience they need to serve. But when they encounter limited English proficient individuals, communication can be difficult or non-existent. Learn how the Language Map App, developed by the Department of Justice, can help you determine in minutes if there are LEP individuals in your area and which language(s) they speak.

Join our DOJ colleagues on 7/20 at 1 PM as they demonstrate the Language Map App. The App will help you assess the language needs of your LEP population to more effectively reach them.

Hope to see you there!

My apologies if you're receiving this message more than once - sharing with a couple of listservs.

Now that the Revised Section 508 Standards are final there are a lot of changes in the way that the Federal government 'develops, procures, maintains, and uses' ICT. One of the biggest changes is that it is now mandatory to develop and test against the *W3C's **WCAG 2.0 standards.

This session will presented by Bruce Bailey, Access Board and Katie Haritos-Shea, WCAG and 508 Subject matter expert. They will be going into detail about how the WCAG 2.0 standards affect the way your organization procures, develops, and tests ICT with regard to the Revised Section 508 Standards. They will also be sharing resources to help you get started. This will be an interactive forum so bring your questions for the experts.

Please share this within your agency with anyone who will have to use WCAG 2.0 guidelines.

Just referencing the domain name:

.gov domains are very hard to acquire, you can't get one from GoDaddy. If you let it go, it can't be picked up by an "adult entertainment" site, and/or held captive by anyone. I don't know enough about the details of hosting a .gov to speak to that.

If I were changing now, I'd ensure that the .com was paid up for years into the future. I'd do roll-overs with tracking for a year or two, then let it go dead for a long time before considering letting it go completely. Alternatively, you could give to a trusted organization in the city – Chamber of Commerce, Senior Center, Volunteers or similar.

Yep.

For just those reasons, federal agencies are required to use .gov or .mil. It's a known governmental brand, guaranteed to not be a scam, etc.

Just referencing the domain name:

.gov domains are very hard to acquire, you can't get one from GoDaddy. If you let it go, it can't be picked up by an "adult entertainment" site, and/or held captive by anyone. I don't know enough about the details of hosting a .gov to speak to that.

If I were changing now, I'd ensure that the .com was paid up for years into the future. I'd do roll-overs with tracking for a year or two, then let it go dead for a long time before considering letting it go completely. Alternatively, you could give to a trusted organization in the city – Chamber of Commerce, Senior Center, Volunteers or similar.

Our SharePoint Server Administrator used a PowerShell Script to come up with that for me when we were planning our migration. Do you have a SharePoint Server Administrator you can contact to see if he/she could do it for you? Ours did it very quickly and also provided other great helpful data to go along with it.

HHS Teams with Healthline.com to Serve Consumers

A new collaboration between the Department of Health and Human Services and Healthline.com will greatly expand the delivery of HHS syndicated content.

“As the fastest-growing consumer health information website, we are trusted by millions of people each day and are so pleased to be partnering with HHS to make their timely and authoritative information available on Healthline.com,” said David Kopp, CEO of Healthline®.

The HHS-Healthline alliance is described in a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between the two organizations that is based on “mutual recognition of the need to empower consumers with health information they can apply in daily life.” The goal is to “provide and promote HHS website content to consumers” and offer to them “high quality and timely content concerning health and public research.” The MOU makes clear that the alliance involves no financial obligation for either party.

The HHS storefront content ranges in content type, including infographics, social media-tailored posts, widgets, and the API-driven dynamically updated content.

This dynamic content can be extremely powerful, essentially allowing another organization to post a small amount of JavaScript in order to provide a full microsite developed around a particular theme. The content will update as the associated agency updates their own site, helping reduce maintenance overhead and ensuring potentially critical content remains updated.

The goal of the collaboration is to further the development of research, education, and outreach partnerships which in turn supports HHS's mission. HHS hopes to continue to further disseminate its content by aligning with more partners, public and private.

For more information about this collaboration please contact mailto:Christen.Geiler@HHS.gov?subject=Healthline MOU

For the same reasons, the DoD (and possibly other agencies) have a social media registry that citizens can consult to confirm that social media accounts claiming to be owned/operated by DoD entities actually are.

All,

Very interesting thread.

Just a side note: Voice of America (one of the five networks of the independent federal agency, The Broadcasting Board of Governors (www.bbg.gov)) actually is a federal agency too. However, we use .com for our websites (www.insidevoa.com and www.voanews.com – and all of our 47 language websites) and our email addresses since our more than 1,000 journalists operate around the world – many in places not friendly to .gov.

We all also have bbg.gov email addresses, but we use .com on a daily basis. I put both email addresses in my signature block just in case folks get confused about whether we are really federal or not!

Just the exception to the rule. ☺

Hello and good afternoon,

Is there a tool or application that will count all of the pages in a SharePoint site? Not just the Google indexed ones.

Thanks!

I think the original subject was different than the resulting subject. But given we're on the latter (.gov domains), I'll share a few highlights from a similar project at SSA. We're planning on two new subdomains as a result of OMB's M-17-06.

<https://www.choosework.net/> and <https://yourtickettowork.com/web/ttw/home> have been long-time web sites of their own as official SSA web sites, but now need .gov domains, so SSA is adding them as subdomains. We just completed the network updates (e.g. DNS entries) and the security certificates. We're about ready for the actual move which includes redirects for the applicable email addresses. Afterwards, we'll be looking into the analytics and possibly moving those into our existing GA account.

Why are we doing this? Well, that's two-fold. As Jeffrey mentioned, we're required by OMB. But just as importantly we decided that it will make a difference with the anticipated User Experience. As we've dealt with our former canonical socialsecurity.gov domain which we still use, we're now using ssa.gov as our canonical. So our domain usage at a technical level is much more consistent – across the board – including emails.

If you're not already aware, the process (as I understand it) for a new .gov domain starts with the registration service on dotgov.

Hope that helps.

For the same reasons, the DoD (and possibly other agencies) have a social media registry that citizens can consult to confirm that social media accounts claiming to be owned/operated by DoD entities actually are.

Yep.

For just those reasons, federal agencies are required to use .gov or .mil. It's a known governmental brand, guaranteed to not be a scam, etc.

Just referencing the domain name:
.gov domains are very hard to acquire, you can't get one from GoDaddy. If you let it go, it can't be picked up by an "adult entertainment" site, and/or held captive by anyone. I don't know enough about the details of hosting a .gov to speak to that.

If I were changing now, I'd ensure that the .com was paid up for years into the future. I'd do roll-overs with tracking for a year or two, then let it go dead for a long time before considering letting it go completely. Alternatively, you could give to a trusted organization in the city – Chamber of Commerce, Senior Center, Volunteers or similar.

Our SharePoint Server Administrator used a PowerShell Script to come up with that for me when we were planning our migration. Do you have a SharePoint Server Administrator you can contact to see if he/she could do it for you? Ours did it very quickly and also provided other great helpful data to go along with it.

Thank you,

Donna

Subject: Language Access and Online Comms

Happy Friday!

I was recently asked for my thoughts on:

- Challenges in web content, design, and management from a language access perspective
- Challenges in social media efforts from a language access perspective

I thought this might be useful to others, too, so here you go. This list isn't comprehensive, just what came to me within a few minutes.

I don't mean to suggest that maintaining websites and social media in other languages can't be done. In fact, we run a Spanish website and several Spanish social media channels – see my signature block below for links.

But if someone comes to you and says “let's build a website in X language,” they need to understand it's not as simple as hiring a contractor with someone who speaks the language.

One overarching challenge for all of it, of course, is: how do you staff your effort?

Web challenges:

- What content will you translate? All of it? All of it going forward from some launch date? If not, what's the decision mechanism? Will you ever go back to the stuff you didn't translate? And how will you assess those decisions, and the entire decision process, over time to change things as appropriate?
- Deciding which languages to translate into: includes determining who your audiences are, where they are, how much English they might speak, and whether they would even come to our website. Going beyond the initial effort, how do you assess this regularly to decide when to start translating into a new language or stop translating into an existing language?
- Finding a reliable translation mechanism with QA controls (how do you know the first translator got it right?); no one I know in this field believes that machine translation works well enough to trust for a gov't agency
- Maintenance: once you start translating, you have to continue your translation investment indefinitely or have a trigger point beyond which you'll no longer use a particular language (for example, if web traffic falls below a certain level).
- Design: are there cultural sensitivities or even just differences to pay attention to? For example, do the color schemes normally used in the US work as well for people from other cultures? If your target audience isn't as web-savvy, do they know how to use various techniques (for example, how to manage multiple tabs) or design elements (for example, do they know how to open accordions)? Those points will determine how to lay out the website (color schemes, page elements, etc.) and how to create the reader's experience (open new items in tabs, new windows, or in the same window? Can you use icons – will they understand them? Etc.).
- Normal web page maintenance planning: this is the same as for any web page, but you also have to build translation into the workflow. Keep in mind that any last-minute changes also need to be translated, so it's often best to not even start until the English is finally approved.
- Promotion: how do you get the word out to your target audience, who, by definition, doesn't speak English. So your promotion needs to be translated, too. But you also have to identify English-speaking intermediaries: advocates, libraries, similar agencies in other countries to work with as partners, foreign-language media, etc. Multiply all of that times the number of languages you choose to work with.

Social media challenges:

- All of the translation issues above apply here as well, but add in a time pressure if you want to respond to anyone in-language.
- How to reach the audience that speaks the language? Random posts in a language on an account that's normally in English aren't effective – they won't reach your target audience. On the other hand, directly addressing in English aren't effective – they won't reach your target audience. On the other hand, directly addressing intermediaries in a language might reach them (you can direct posts in many social media platforms to get the attention of someone).

- How to determine whether your outreach is worth the effort?
- If you decide to run an account entirely within a language, you must learn how to do that in whichever channel you choose. For example: can you change the navigation and site tools to the desired language, or will they be an English wrapper around in-language content?
- Social media isn't a panacea – what specific features of a specific channel make it more or less useful for that particular language. For example, there are Chinese-language social media sites that are barely known in the US.

- Challenges in web content, design, and management from a language access perspective
- Challenges in social media efforts from a language access perspective

I thought this might be useful to others, too, so here you go. This list isn't comprehensive, just what came to me within a few minutes.

I don't mean to suggest that maintaining websites and social media in other languages can't be done. In fact, we run a Spanish website and several Spanish social media channels – see my signature block below for links.

But if someone comes to you and says “let's build a website in X language,” they need to understand it's not as simple as hiring a contractor with someone who speaks the language.

One overarching challenge for all of it, of course, is: how do you staff your effort?

Web challenges:

- What content will you translate? All of it? All of it going forward from some launch date? If not, what's the decision mechanism? Will you ever go back to the stuff you didn't translate? And how will you assess those decisions, and the entire decision process, over time to change things as appropriate?

- Deciding which languages to translate into: includes determining who your audiences are, where they are, how much English they might speak, and whether they would even come to our website. Going beyond the initial effort, how do you assess this regularly to decide when to start translating into a new language or stop translating into an existing language?
- Finding a reliable translation mechanism with QA controls (how do you know the first translator got it right?); no one I know in this field believes that machine translation works well enough to trust for a gov't agency
- Maintenance: once you start translating, you have to continue your translation investment indefinitely or have a trigger point beyond which you'll no longer use a particular language (for example, if web traffic falls below a certain level).
- Design: are there cultural sensitivities or even just differences to pay attention to? For example, do the color schemes normally used in the US work as well for people from other cultures? If your target audience isn't as web-savvy, do they know how to use various techniques (for example, how to manage multiple tabs) or design elements (for example, do they know how to open accordions?)? Those points will determine how to lay out the website (color schemes, page elements, etc.) and how to create the reader's experience (open new items in tabs, new windows, or in the same window? Can you use icons – will they understand them? Etc.).
- Normal web page maintenance planning: this is the same as for any web page, but you also have to build translation into the workflow. Keep in mind that any last-minute changes also need to be translated, so it's often best to not even start until the English is finally approved.
- Promotion: how do you get the word out to your target audience, who, by definition, doesn't speak English. So your promotion needs to be translated, too. But you also have to identify English-speaking intermediaries: advocates, libraries, similar agencies in other countries to work with as partners, foreign-language media, etc. Multiply all of that times the number of languages you choose to work with.

Social media challenges:

- All of the translation issues above apply here as well, but add in a time pressure if you want to respond to anyone in-language.
- How to reach the audience that speaks the language? Random posts in a language on an account that's normally in English aren't effective – they won't reach your target audience. On the other hand, directly addressing intermediaries in a language might reach them (you can direct posts in many social media platforms to get the attention of someone).
- How to determine whether your outreach is worth the effort?
- If you decide to run an account entirely within a language, you must learn how to do that in whichever channel you choose. For example: can you change the navigation and site tools to the desired language, or will they be an English wrapper around in-language content?
- Social media isn't a panacea – what specific features of a specific channel make it more or less useful for that particular language. For example, there are Chinese-language social media sites that are barely known in the US.

Folks,

DotGov domains provide both a high trust factor being the Backbone of the Federal Government and higher security through a stringent set of ongoing checks and controls assisting Network providers. There is no Cyber-squatting in DotGov due to naming conventions. Local jurisdictions will use the name of the city/town and the two letter state postal abbreviation. (e.g. TitusvilleFL.gov or Titusville-FL.gov). There are several advantages of being a DotGov:

- There is instant recognition that the domain name is the official site of city.
- DotGov is a single registry domain and only allows each name to be registered by the official organization.
- There is no non-government advertising on DotGov domains. Only official information and content for constituents.
- As a safety issue the Department of Homeland Security will occasionally scan the domain looking for harmful malware and computer viruses. More information is available on www.dotgov.gov.

I am including Lee Ellis here (the DotGov Program Manager) on this chain, who can chime in as well as set up an offline discussion to provide more information, if needed.

Hope this helps,

Thanks,

Marina

I think the original subject was different than the resulting subject. But given we're on the latter (.gov domains), I'll share a few highlights from a similar project at SSA. We're planning on two new subdomains as a result of OMB's M-17-06.

<https://www.choosework.net/> and <https://yourtickettowork.com/web/ttw/home> have been long-time web sites of their own as official SSA web sites, but now need .gov domains, so SSA is adding them as subdomains. We just completed the network updates (e.g. DNS entries) and the security certificates. We're about ready for the actual move which includes redirects for the applicable email addresses. Afterwards, we'll be looking into the analytics and possibly moving those into our existing GA account.

Why are we doing this? Well, that's two-fold. As Jeffrey mentioned, we're required by OMB. But just as importantly we decided that it will make a difference with the anticipated User Experience. As we've dealt with our former canonical socialsecurity.gov domain which we still use, we're now using ssa.gov as our canonical. So our domain usage at a technical level is much more consistent – across the board – including emails.

If you're not already aware, the process (as I understand it) for a new .gov domain starts with the registration service on dotgov.

Hope that helps.

For the same reasons, the DoD (and possibly other agencies) have a social media registry that citizens can consult to confirm that social media accounts claiming to be owned/operated by DoD entities actually are.

For just those reasons, federal agencies are required to use .gov or .mil. It's a known governmental brand, guaranteed to not be a scam, etc.

Just referencing the domain name:

.gov domains are very hard to acquire, you can't get one from GoDaddy. If you let it go, it can't be picked up by an "adult entertainment" site, and/or held captive by anyone. I don't know enough about the details of hosting a .gov to speak to that.

If I were changing now, I'd ensure that the .com was paid up for years into the future. I'd do roll-overs with tracking for a year or two, then let it go dead for a long time before considering letting it go completely. Alternatively, you could give to a trusted organization in the city – Chamber of Commerce, Senior Center, Volunteers or similar.

There are a few other considerations:

1. Localization. Translatable content as opposed to an entire site in one language then another in another language. An example of this is <https://www.finnair.com/> where they ASK you what language OR locality detected like with British Airways (where they look at where you are before giving you a language).
2. SEO. You can't provide mixed language content on sites without suffering an SEO issue. Search engines look for these anomalies and consider them to be SPAM or malicious content in general.

Doing multi-lingual sites requires some thought about what you're targeting and why. Building it is a completely different issue but there are some excellent Drupal modules to help with it like

- https://www.drupal.org/project/entity\_translation
- https://www.drupal.org/project/tmgmt\_globalsight
- <https://www.drupal.org/project/tmgmt>
- <https://www.drupal.org/project/i18n>

If you're coming to Drupal GovCon next week I'd suggest talking to the folks from Hook42 if you are looking at translation and internationalization. They literally write the code for a lot of this and are committers on several of the modules I noted above. You can also look at Lingotek for this type of expertise. <https://www.lingotek.com/>

Lingotek also created some documentation for multi-lingual sites here <https://www.drupal.org/docs/7/multilingual/translating-content>

Happy Friday!

I was recently asked for my thoughts on:

- Challenges in web content, design, and management from a language access perspective
- Challenges in social media efforts from a language access perspective

I thought this might be useful to others, too, so here you go. This list isn't comprehensive, just what came to me within a few minutes.

I don't mean to suggest that maintaining websites and social media in other languages can't be done. In fact, we run a Spanish website and several Spanish social media channels – see my signature block below for links.

But if someone comes to you and says “let's build a website in X language,” they need to understand it's not as simple as hiring a contractor with someone who speaks the language.

One overarching challenge for all of it, of course, is: how do you staff your effort?

Web challenges:

- What content will you translate? All of it? All of it going forward from some launch date? If not, what's the decision mechanism? Will you ever go back to the stuff you didn't translate? And how will you assess those decisions, and the entire decision process, over time to change things as appropriate?
- Deciding which languages to translate into: includes determining who your audiences are, where they are, how much English they might speak, and whether they would even come to our website. Going beyond the initial effort, how do you assess this regularly to decide when to start translating into a new language or stop translating into an existing language?
- Finding a reliable translation mechanism with QA controls (how do you know the first translator got it right?); no one I know in this field believes that machine translation works well enough to trust for a gov't agency
- Maintenance: once you start translating, you have to continue your translation investment indefinitely or have a trigger point beyond which you'll no longer use a particular language (for example, if web traffic falls below a certain level).
- Design: are there cultural sensitivities or even just differences to pay attention to? For example, do the color schemes normally used in the US work as well for people from other cultures? If your target audience isn't as web-savvy, do they know how to use various techniques (for example, how to manage multiple tabs) or design elements (for example, do they know how to open accordions)? Those points will determine how to lay out the website (color schemes, page elements, etc.) and how to create the reader's experience (open new items in tabs, new windows, or in the same window? Can you use icons – will they understand them? Etc.).
- Normal web page maintenance planning: this is the same as for any web page, but you also have to build translation into the workflow. Keep in mind that any last-minute changes also need to be translated, so it's often best to not even start until the English is finally approved.
- Promotion: how do you get the word out to your target audience, who, by definition, doesn't speak English. So your promotion needs to be translated, too. But you also have to identify English-speaking intermediaries: advocates, libraries, similar agencies in other countries to work with as partners, foreign-language media, etc. Multiply all of that times the number of languages you choose to work with.

Social media challenges:

- All of the translation issues above apply here as well, but add in a time pressure if you want to respond to anyone in-language.
- How to reach the audience that speaks the language? Random posts in a language on an account that's normally

- How to reach the audience that speaks the language? Random posts in a language on an account that's normally in English aren't effective – they won't reach your target audience. On the other hand, directly addressing intermediaries in a language might reach them (you can direct posts in many social media platforms to get the attention of someone).
- How to determine whether your outreach is worth the effort?
- If you decide to run an account entirely within a language, you must learn how to do that in whichever channel you choose. For example: can you change the navigation and site tools to the desired language, or will they be an English wrapper around in-language content?
- Social media isn't a panacea – what specific features of a specific channel make it more or less useful for that particular language. For example, there are Chinese-language social media sites that are barely known in the US.

I had commented earlier today on the sites blog about a working group a few years ago.

We'd basically suggested that we look at a way to collaborate with Canada on The Web Experience Toolkit \(WxT\). It occurred to me that folks might not remember it or for that matter even know it exists.

So, as a reminder, the Canadian gov't lost a court case on accessibility of Canadian gov't web sites. So, in an effort to make all gov websites accessible, a team at Statistics Canada embarked on an idea of growing and contributing to a project run by gov but that anyone can contribute to or use. Yep, that open sourced it by investing in government employees from local gov't (first to use it was Ottawa city gov't) to Statistics Canada to many accessibility experts. They've contributed tests, code, configuration, UX, etc and they've done it through code snippets that are reusable and modular. A plug and play if you will.

The project is still on going and they're at the stage now (for the past year) of continuous improvement with quarterly dev cycles.

If you're interested in how to use WxT for your own projects I highly recommend checking out WxT.

Good morning,

Our agency's office is exploring information on the why's and how's of transitioning from SharePoint to Drupal 7 (or 8). I know that are many moving parts to a government site. Does anyone have links or documentation they could share about the transition process to Drupal?

The preference is SharePoint → Drupal 7 or 8, but going from any content management system would suffice.

Thanks!

Federal Agency PDF Trainings – September 2017, Washington D.C.

Introduction to Accessible PDFs – September 18, 2017

Making PDF documents and forms accessible can be a daunting task when you don't know what tools are available and which is the best one to use for each specific issue.

In this session, participants will be introduced to the various tools available in Acrobat Pro DC. We will walk through the workflow to take a document, convert it to a PDF, and remediate some of the basic tagging issues.

This class is for novices in PDF accessibility and will cover elements such as:

- Why it is important to have an accessible source document.
- The various tools in Acrobat Pro DC and how to remediate basic issues in an inaccessible PDF.
- How to convert a scanned document to an accessible PDF.

The goal for this training is to give participants the basic skills necessary to create an accessible PDF. It is a hands-on, lab style course so come prepared to do some work. There will be little to no lecture, just demos and practice. Participants will receive a USB drive at the beginning of the session with the practice materials as well as a guide for creating accessible PDFs that can be used after the session.

To participate in the class attendees MUST come with the following:

1. A laptop computer

2. Acrobat Pro DC installed on the laptop (the trial version is fine)

3. Microsoft Office (Word) installed on the laptop

As seating is limited, please do not sign up for the course unless you can meet the requirements.

Advanced PDF Accessibility – September 22, 2017

So, you've gotten pretty comfortable working with PDF documents but you run into unique issues that you just don't know how to resolve to make the PDF accessible and conform with the PDF/UA standard. This session will address some of the more complex issues that people frequently run into. This is NOT an introduction class and we will not spend time on the basics of using Acrobat Pro DC.

Prior to the class, those registered will be invited to provide issues that they would like to see addressed. In addition to those, some of the issues we will cover include:

- Recent updates to Acrobat Pro DC to make it easier to create accessible PDFs.
- The workflow for creating accessible PDF forms.
- Addressing structural elements such as complex tables, headers & footers, and annotations.

The goal for this training is to build on your skills in creating accessible PDFs and improve your expertise. It is a hands-on, lab style course so come prepared to do some work. There will be little time spent on lecturing, the focus will be on demos and practicing new skills. Participants will receive a USB drive at the beginning of the session with the practice materials, tips and tricks for easily creating accessible PDFs, and a guide for creating accessible PDFs that can be used after the session.

To participate in the class attendees MUST:

- 1. Have a basic understanding of how to create an accessible PDF.
- 2. Bring a laptop computer.
- 3. Have Acrobat Pro DC installed on the laptop (the trial version is fine).
- 4. Insure that Microsoft Office (Word) is installed on the laptop.

As seating is limited, please do not sign up for the course unless you meet the requirements.

I have been doing some work to further refine our site since we launched with an upgrade last fall. I have been doing some reading and studying of SVG versus PNG or JPG files. I wanted input please.

If you have an image that a user wishes to download at a higher resolution version, to me it would go to reason that perhaps we should be using SVG file types. But I hear that there are limitations as to which browsers or mobile devices are supporting SVG. I just want to give my users the best image quality possible without chewing up bandwidth or taking forever to download.

Thanks in advance

Greetings,

My agency is planning a network overhaul to be more FISMA compliant. I was recently told that I would soon have to log in to a "jump" computer via VPN to edit and write code. My question is, how common is this for federal agencies?

Thanks,
Steve

Most organizations have a developers group where coders have well-managed permissions so they can do this type of work. My teams, both intranet and Internet developers, don't have special computers or VPN unless they are working off site.

I don't know what "jump computer" means.

Our whole agency now works solely on laptops to make it easier to telework. We can log in via a VPN (a secure way to access our shared network drives and a personal network drive, along with our intranet and various things like our time reporting system).

We can also use Workplace as a Service, which allows us to log in from any computer on the Internet, with the same privileges.

Note that we're a DHS component agency, so I'm absolutely certain this is FISMA-compliant.

BTW, we had the same options when I was at EPA 2 1/2 years go.

You will see across the Federal landscape everyone does it differently, even within DHS components.

At USCIS, we do enforce the use of “jumpboxes” to access privileged user ports for our server assets, like port 22 (SSH) and port 3389 (Microsoft RDP). This is used to control privileged access – in turn, makes our SOC monitoring much easier to know that *trusted* connections should ingress and egress from the dedicated jumpboxes to our server assets by privileged users from our Developer user network IP ranges.

As Jeffrey stated below, devs can access our jumpboxes only after they have remotely accessed + authenticated to our network via VPN or WpaaS – both with PIV auth. You cannot hit these jumpboxes from public internet. Developers log into these jumpboxes via their PIVs via SSH, and then configure a port redirection on their local workstations through the jumpbox to then log into the target server via SSH or RDP depending on the target server’s OS.

Frankly, developers should not be doing this often – this is why they should be using automated CI/CD pipelines to deploy directly via git commits to manage their code deployments into test and production environments to be completely “hands off” and avoid the “well, my code worked on *my* computer” issue.

Be aware more restricted environments, like most of DoD, *do not* allow this remote access activity. You must be physically be in the building to commit code against a version control system and the server assets.

Now that the Revised Section 508 Standards are final there are a lot of changes in the way that the Federal government 'develops, procures, maintains, and uses' ICT. One of the biggest changes is that it is now mandatory to develop and test against the *W3C's **WCAG 2.0 standards.

This session will be presented by Bruce Bailey, Access Board and Katie Haritos-Shea, WCAG and 508 Subject matter expert. They will be going into detail about how the WCAG 2.0 standards affect the way your organization procures, develops, and tests ICT with regard to the Revised Section 508 Standards. They will also be sharing resources to help you get started. This will be an interactive forum so bring your questions for the experts.

Please share this within your agency with anyone who will have to use WCAG 2.0 guidelines.

Hi Latasha,

I know lots of agencies are using Optimal Sort but GSA did not negotiate a fed-friendly TOS since there isn't a "free" version.

I think CPFBI did negotiate a TOS for Optimal Sort and Jon Rubin may be able to share this with you but ice/dhs would still have to ask OS to agree to the same or similar terms if you decide to do a procurement.

Hope this helps,

Betsy

Here is an attempt to apply data science tools to web site repair problems to speed up web site repairs and lower their various costs to the organization. The types of repairs covered might include broken links, images that are too large for smartphones, "dark matter" - unreviewed content that may be damaging search effectiveness, alt text issues for images, etc. - whatever heretofore-unseen, site-code-related problem emerges or has been passed down as a 'must fix ASAP.'

<https://github.com/wendlingd/AccelerateWebSiteRepairs>

I am mashing up data from SEO Spider (Screaming Frog is the vendor), which is a COTS site-spidering tool for the desktop; I am using an R script for processing (free tool), and I am adding in Google Analytics traffic data and site architecture/governance pointers, then summarizing in a variety of ways.

Comments/improvements welcome.

Greetings,

If I was in China, where the official language is not English, and on the web in a Windows OS -

* If I tried to read the source code behind a web page with <head lang="en-US">, would the displayed web page and "display source" be in English?

* In Notepad, and doing a plain HTML page, would I have to do English even if the content was intended for a Mandarin audience?

Just curious. Actually, I'm feeling kind of naive.

Thanks Joseph Gilvary. Thanks everyone.

I'm beginning to see the HTML tags like pieces of a mathematical sentence, ie. international equations, with operators like the integration "S" and the summation sigma, plus the Hindu-Arabic numbers and some lower-case Greek angle measures. And, let us not forget irrationals and transcendentals.

Like a language of science. Wow!

Happy Friday Eve,

I'm not an expert, but I have used non-English computer interfaces as well as read and composed non-English web content. On this list I hope we can get a response from someone with considerable experience.

So there are lots of variables (OS language version of the Windows machine, browser language version, etc.), but in essence, if the page source HTML was written "in English," then you should be able to see it in English like that.

The lang attribute is a hint, but it doesn't control the language. Maybe it can help the browser decide whether to render left-to-right if that attribute is missing, or help an assistive technology to choose a particular lexicon in reading the page aloud. It could potentially help a scraper, web crawler, or even the web server software itself recognize the declared language of the content in the page. But you can put "lang=en-US" and then write the page in any language and character set your authoring tools will support. I wouldn't be surprised to see some English language version of HTML authoring tools produce pages tagged like that for content in other languages, if the stories of software piracy outside the U.S. of A. have any merit.

Maybe in a while we can specify a target language in a request and have some part of the machinery attempt a translation to that target language for pages, API responses, etc. There's some interesting work in automated translation of human language, but the details are beyond my expertise. The pop-science accounts sound like this could be real as a consumer level technology within a few years. Even today Chrome sometimes asks me if I want it to translate pages, but I think that's a Chrome/Google feature. I don't believe there's any standard for such requests and the appropriate responses, but as the technology progresses, there will be a need for a formal or de-facto standardization.

If others know more about how this might be working in the real world or about any efforts for standardizing such requests and services, I'd love to learn about them.

The Notepad (or any other authoring tool) would need to support the character set you want to use, unless you're comfortable writing Unicode in hex. :D I don't know enough about the Mandarin language or about MS support for it in tools like Notepad. Writing HTML content in languages besides English that use the Roman alphabet only requires specifying the correct Unicode code points for accented characters, ligatures, etc. I've never created HTML in languages that use other scripts, unless I copied and pasted some Klingon into a tweet somewhere along the line, so I can't say what Notepad would support. Whether it's Notepad or something local to the Chinese market, if the editor can encode the Mandarin glyphs correctly (i.e., specify the correct hexadecimal codes for the glyphs you intend), then you as the human author can create the page.

The HTML markup (tags, attributes) needs to be in "English," as far as I know. You can't use the Mandarin equivalents of "head" and "lang" in place of the tag as you wrote in your question. But the stuff of the page can use any character set recognized in Unicode to create text in any language. You can write Tlingit with the Greek alphabet, if you know enough about each to choose the characters that make the correct sounds. That's really no different than when we see Mandarin written with the Roman alphabet.

And please, any experts out there, or even folks with real web experience, please correct where I'm wrong and supplement with important points I missed.

Thanks,

Joe

Greetings,

If I was in China, where the official language is not English, and on the web in a Windows OS -

- * If I tried to read the source code behind a web page with <head lang="en-US">, would the displayed web page and "display source" be in English?
- * In Notepad, and doing a plain HTML page, would I have to do English even if the content was intended for a Mandarin audience?

Just curious. Actually, I'm feeling kind of naive.

Hello,

We have a GS-13 User Experience Lead position open at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office. It's open until August 29.

Here is the link for all job applicants.

DE: <https://www.usajobs.gov/GetJob/ViewDetails/477120700>

And here is the link for current federal employees and people who can be hired under a special hiring authority, such as veterans and people with disabilities who have "Schedule A" hiring preference. As with all federal jobs, if you are qualified to apply using this "MP" announcement link, then also apply using the "DE" announcement link.

MP: <https://www.usajobs.gov/GetJob/ViewDetails/477121100>

You'll find general information about the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) and the Office of the CIO in the announcement. The USPTO has unique flexible schedule options and telework. We have solid training opportunities, too. The User Experience Branch is a close-knit group of people who regularly collaborate and share ideas.

Good luck, if you decide to apply.

Thanks,
Arva

The Lab is happy to announce a few new courses that you can take with us: Visual Eloquence and Mapping Systems and Processes!

Title: Visual Eloquence (Sketching, Diagramming, and more)

Description: Drawing in its multiple variations -sketching, diagramming, doodling, tracing, collaging, rendering, etc. is at the core of the human-centered design process in government. We put pen to paper, and marker to whiteboard, to quickly visualize and explain complex problems; to understand the depth of the insights and ideas we generate to address them; and to present our design process to an audience. In design, visual eloquence is a requisite to express, explain, communicate, and clarify to others -and to ourselves- what would be much harder and slower to explain with written or spoken words. This hands-on module introduces the principles of visual eloquence for thinking and acting in human-centered design.

Title: Mapping Systems and Processes

Description: Human-centered design brings to government the ability to visually represent complex systems, processes, and human interactions. While data visualizations and infographics are abstract representations of numbers, maps are graphic spaces designed to combine information and meaning. A map is a space of pathways and relationships that combine information and meaning. A map is a space of pathways and relationships that facilitates navigation and way-finding; but it is also a territory of possibility that invites the viewer to explore, discover, and envision. This condition of having multiple readings - objective and subjective, implicit and explicit, symbolic and literal, etc. situates mapping at the center of the human-design process.

Subject: Federalist - compliant and flexible web hosting

Hi everyone,

I'm Will with GSA. I've only posted a few times but was asked to share information with y'all about Federalist, a system we built to provide compliant web hosting support within GSA and for federal partners. One of my main goals is to empower content owners to be able to edit their own sites (or approve others' edits) without requiring a change order.

Federalist left beta in June and we're looking to scale up our customer base beyond our six current customer agencies. I'm SUPER excited about it and would love to get y'all's feedback and questions as we work to raise awareness.

Features:

- Federalist is great for brochure sites announcing a new program or campaign, or for a specific office. Thanks to how we host, you can spin up a new Federalist site, fully compliantly, in two days if needed.
- Federalist allows you to easily preview every edit to your site before it goes live. (example preview link)
- You can use Federalist with an API server to display data like with the College Scorecard.
- Federalist sites are deployed using cloud.gov, which is FedRAMP moderate (though our ATO is for low sites only)
- We provide default templates you can customize (deep customization requires some technical skill). Our templates are 508-friendly and responsive for mobile.

Here are some other example Federalist sites of the 77 currently live.

- <https://seedfund.nsf.gov> (announced 8/10/17)
- <https://useiti.doi.gov/>
- <https://vote.gov/>

Technical background:

- Federalist works by taking your site's data on GitHub, building it all of your HTML pages in cloud.gov, and then deploying those on Amazon S3 behind HTTPS, again via cloud.gov.
- It's a static hosting service, meaning that your sites can't accept comments on articles like with a CMS, but providing much easier compliance since your site doesn't have a server that can be hacked - just files sitting in Amazon S3.
- I wouldn't suggest Federalist for sites with many thousands of pages or to host more than 1GB of data directly.
- More detailed information on our documentation site.

You can read more about Federalist on the blog, on the attached slicksheet. I'd also be happy to answer questions or get y'all's feedback on how Federalist can support you! Federalist costs $24,949/year by default to host as many sites as your office needs, along with use of the GSA ATO that covers the 77 current sites. This is mostly due to compliance costs on our end, and we don't charge anything for usage. I've actively exploring other services to pair with Federalist, like accessibility audits, and would be interested in what else folks would want.

If you're interested, or if you have comments/questions, just reply to me and cc federalist-inquiries@gsa.gov. Thank you!

-Will Slack, GSA

Wendy,

If this is web-based timeline, maybe a simple, responsive approach that runs vertically so that it can be easily viewed without left/right scrolling.

This WP plug in is what kind of came to mind as a visual example of what I am thinking of:

Hope that helps some as you try to figure out a solution.

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] ISO example of a graphic that displays a long timeline

Hello all,
I'm thinking about a way to graphically display a list of milestones over a long period of time – such as three decades. If anyone has an example of something like this and is willing to share, I would be much obliged.
Many thanks,
Wendy

We weren't 100% sure, so we coded a text version of the same timeline, which you can access by clicking on "View the list of milestones."

We use Timeline.js on Archives.gov and ObamaLibrary.gov.

Our developer forked the main TimelineJS3 and addressed accessibility requirements there. It's at <https://github.com/usnationalarchives/TimelineJS3>. However, we did not see the TimelineJS3 maintainer merge our code to the main stream. If people need to use the library, you'd have to use our forked version.

Hello all,
I'm thinking about a way to graphically display a list of milestones over a long period of time – such as three decades. If anyone has an example of something like this and is willing to share, I would be much obliged.
Many thanks,

Afternoon –

In preparation for Hurricane Harvey, we're setting up a preliminary lane of communication structure for federal web communications. This authority for this action comes from Emergency Support Function 15 of the National Response Framework. Please forward this message as necessary.

(For those not familiar with the lane structure, the idea is to eliminate cross-posting of information among agencies and, instead, have everyone provide links to centralized "lanes" of information. So, for example, Transportation might post a press release related to Transportation activities... and instead of every other agency trying to keep up with adding that link to their site as well, a link to the Transportation release is added to one centralized page on USA.gov and everyone just links to that one page for information on What the U.S. Government is Doing.)

At this point, we're standing up two initial lanes. When distributing materials related to Hurricane Harvey, please include links to these two lanes.

What DHS and FEMA are Doing

<https://www.fema.gov/hurricane-harvey>

FEMA has established a landing page on FEMA.gov with the latest information from FEMA and DHS on the storm. The page is currently promoting preparedness information / resources... once we switch into response and recovery, the page will update and serve as a clearinghouse for related information from DHS. The page is located at <https://www.fema.gov/hurricane-harvey>.

What the U.S. Government is Doing

<https://www.usa.gov/hurricane-harvey>

GSA has created a landing page on USA.gov for government-wide information related to Hurricane Harvey activities. The Lab is happy to announce a few new courses that you can take with us: Visual Eloquence and Mapping Systems and Processes!

Title: Visual Eloquence (Sketching, Diagramming, and more)

Description: Drawing in its multiple variations -sketching, diagramming, doodling, tracing, collaging, rendering, etc. is at the core of the human-centered design process in government. We put pen to paper, and marker to whiteboard, to quickly visualize and explain complex problems; to understand the depth of the insights and ideas we generate to address them; and to present our design process to an audience. In design, visual eloquence is a requisite to express, explain, communicate, and clarify to others -and to ourselves- what would be much harder and slower to explain with written or spoken words. This hands-on module introduces the principles of visual eloquence for thinking and acting in human-centered design.

Title: Mapping Systems and Processes

Description: Human-centered design brings to government the ability to visually represent complex systems, processes, and human interactions. While data visualizations and infographics are abstract representations of numbers, maps are graphic spaces designed to combine information and meaning. A map is a space of pathways and relationships that combine information and meaning. A map is a space of pathways and relationships that facilitates navigation and way-finding; but it is also a territory of possibility that invites the viewer to explore, discover, and envision. This condition of having multiple readings - objective and subjective, implicit and explicit, symbolic and literal, etc. situates mapping at the center of the human-design process.

Just seeing now that you, (b) (6) got my response but the list didn't because I didn't respond to the "are you really trying to post to the list" email. I literally posted just before I shut down the machine and headed out west to see the eclipse.

So if there are any folks on the list with real world experience that bears on Brian's questions or can correct/supplement my response (quoted with all my original typos below), please share.

Thanks,

Joe

Thanks Joseph Gilvary. Thanks everyone.

I'm beginning to see the HTML tags like pieces of a mathematical sentence, ie. international equations, with operators like the integration "S" and the summation sigma, plus the Hindu-Arabic numbers and some lower-case Greek angle measures. And, let us not forget irrationals and transcendentals.

Like a language of science. Wow!

Happy Friday Eve,

I'm not an expert, but I have used non-English computer interfaces as well as read and composed non-English web content. On this list I hope we can get a response from someone with considerable experience.

So there are lots of variables (OS language version of the Windows machine, browser language version, etc.), but in essence, if the page source HTML was written "in English," then you should be able to see it in English like that.

The lang attribute is a hint, but it doesn't control the language. Maybe it can help the browser decide whether to render left-to-right if that attribute is missing, or help an assistive technology to choose a particular lexicon in reading the page aloud. It could potentially help a scraper, web crawler, or even the web server software itself recognize the declared language of the content in the page. But you can put "lang=en-US" and then write the page in any language and character set your authoring tools will support. I wouldn't be surprised to see some English language version of HTML authoring tools produce pages tagged like that for content in other languages, if the stories of software piracy outside the U.S. of A. have any merit.

Maybe in a while we can specify a target language in a request and have some part of the machinery attempt a translation to that target language for pages, API responses, etc. There's some interesting work in automated translation of human language, but the details are beyond my expertise. The pop-science accounts sound like this could be real as a consumer level technology within a few years. Even today Chrome sometimes asks me if I want it to translate pages, but I think that's a Chrome/Google feature. I don't believe there's any standard for such requests and the appropriate responses, but as the technology progresses, there will be a need for a formal or de-facto standardization.

If others know more about how this might be working in the real world or about any efforts for standardizing such requests and services, I'd love to learn about them.

The Notepad (or any other authoring tool) would need to support the character set you want to use, unless you're comfortable writing Unicode in hex. :D I don't know enough about the Mandarin language or about MS support for it in tools like Notepad. Writing HTML content in languages besides English that use the Roman alphabet only requires specifying the correct Unicode code points for accented characters, ligatures, etc. I've never created HTML in languages that use other scripts, unless I copied and pasted some Klingon into a tweet somewhere along the line, so I can't say what Notepad would support. Whether it's Notepad or something local to the Chinese market, if the editor can encode the Mandarin glyphs correctly (i.e., specify the correct hexadecimal codes for the glyphs you intend), then you as the human author can create the page.

The HTML markup (tags, attributes) needs to be in "English," as far as I know. You can't use the Mandarin equivalents of "head" and "lang" in place of the tag as you wrote in your question. But the stuff of the page can use any character set recognized in Unicode to create text in any language. You can write Tlingit with the Greek alphabet, if you know enough about each to choose the characters that make the correct sounds. That's really no different that when we see Mandarin written with the Roman alphabet.

And please, any experts out there, or even folks with real web experience, please correct where I'm wrong and supplement with important points I missed.

Thanks,

Joe

Greetings,

If I was in China, where the official language is not English, and on the web in a Windows OS -

* If I tried to read the source code behind a web page with <head lang="en-US">, would the displayed web page and "display source" be in English?

* In Notepad, and doing a plain HTML page, would I have to do English even if the content was intended for a Mandarin audience?

Just curious. Actually, I'm feeling kind of naive.

Hello Content Managers,
Hopefully some of you have deeper ties to the Wikipedia community of editors that I, since my usual channels have failed me...

There are Wikipedia pages (not created by my agency) that discuss programs of the USPTO. Unfortunately, because of various website updates, several of the references/links on these pages no longer work. The Global Dossier program has also changed, and that isn't reflected in Wikipedia. I know there are various concerns within the Wikipedia community about neutrality and having people too close to the subject matter edit entries, so I asked our staff not to touch entries related to our work.

I am looking for some kind souls from the Wikipedia community to clean up these Wikipedia pages so that the links and references again work and the info is accurate.

These errors are really bothering the USPTO staff responsible for these services – they even tracked down the dead links and compiled the new URLs and text changes they think would improve the entries, as outlined below!

Hi Folks,

On the off-chance that your shop doesn't yet have Wikipedia guidance, here's ours: <https://www.doi.gov/employees/dmguide/social-media-services#wikipedia> -- please feel free to swipe!

I'm not sure how current all the links are (ironic? while on a mission to fix links? possibly), but I think the guidance itself has held up pretty well.

Good luck & happy editing.

Afternoon all –

Just a quick email to update everyone on where we're at regarding the federal web response to Hurricane Harvey...

- Thanks to everyone who has sent content on their agency/department activities to USA.gov. Please continue to send information for inclusion on <https://www.usa.gov/hurricane-harvey> to joanne.mcgovern@gsa.gov and jessica.milcetic@gsa.gov. One tip – they don't need the full content of your release(s) – just send the title and URL of where it's posted on your agency/department website.
- If you would like to create an agency-specific page on your own site – please use /hurricane-harvey as your URL structure whenever possible (i.e. <https://www.xxxxx.gov/hurricane-harvey>). If your content management system doesn't allow for that kind of URL structure, please consider setting /hurricane-harvey as a redirect to the final destination.
- Remember, if you DO create an agency-specific page, please only post information specific to your agency (e.g. please stay in your lane). Please also make sure to link to both USA.gov/hurricane-harvey and <https://www.FEMA.gov/hurricane-harvey> (language below).

Again – thank you all so much for what you do – the overall federal web response to this has been amazing.

Thanks and please keep up the good work!

Subject: [CONTENT MANAGERS] Hurricane Harvey web guidance from DHS

Afternoon –

In preparation for Hurricane Harvey, we're setting up a preliminary lane of communication structure for federal web communications. This authority for this action comes from Emergency Support Function 15 of the National Response Framework. Please forward this message as necessary.

(For those not familiar with the lane structure, the idea is to eliminate cross-posting of information among agencies and, instead, have everyone provide links to centralized "lanes" of information. So, for example, Transportation might post a press release related to Transportation activities... and instead of every other agency trying to keep up with adding that link to their site as well, a link to the Transportation release is added to one centralized page on USA.gov and everyone just links to that one page for information on What the U.S. Government is Doing.)

At this point, we're standing up two initial lanes. When distributing materials related to Hurricane Harvey, please include links to these two lanes.

What DHS and FEMA are Doing

<https://www.fema.gov/hurricane-harvey>

FEMA has established a landing page on FEMA.gov with the latest information from FEMA and DHS on the storm. The page is currently promoting preparedness information / resources... once we switch into response and recovery, the page will update and serve as a clearinghouse for related information from DHS. The page is located at <https://www.fema.gov/hurricane-harvey>.

What the U.S. Government is Doing

<https://www.usa.gov/hurricane-harvey>

GSA has created a landing page on USA.gov for government-wide information related to Hurricane Harvey activities. The page is being populated now – if you have materials from your agency that need to be added to the page, please email joanne.mcgovern@gsa.gov and jessica.milcetic@gsa.gov and they will coordinate posting. USA.gov can support both English and Spanish content. The page is located at <https://www.usa.gov/hurricane-harvey>.

Hello everyone,

My name is Eva Salvetti and I am the LEP coordinator for my agency, Pension benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC).

We are in the process of revamping our customer service hiring, training and testing practices for prospective bilingual Custer Service Representatives. In an effort to improve on our current processes, would like to visit a call center within the Washington metropolitan area for benchmarking purposes.

I am writing to ask if any of your affiliated agency call centers are located within the DMV area and if so; is there a possibility of visiting an agency's Customer Contact Center for a site visit? We would like to learn how their best practices for hiring, training and testing prospective new hires might help to us to improve our bilingual program.

Your help would be truly appreciated it. Feel free to call me at (202) 304-8264 or email me at Salvetti.eva@pbgc.gov

Best regards and thank you!

Eva

Hi!

Was anyone on this list involved in the new IRS.gov redesign or can you possibly put me in contact with someone from that team?

I have a quick question about redirects.

Thanks!

Good morning,

I am hoping the team of experts here can help the NRO... I have a question for Social Media Managers who use multimedia platforms and develop content for social media. The NRO is finally acquiring notebooks for SM use. Yay! Because we are not techies here and from my perspective, we don't have those that are well versed on the best notebooks for such activities, I'm hoping you may provide insights. What makes a good notebook for activities such as live streaming, video, and web casts? If you or someone on your team saw the specs for a few notebook options, could you tell if the notebook models were ideal? May you recommend specific notebook models? My immediate thought is speed and storage but I am not savvy on what I need to get fast and great storage.

Thanks for helping the NRO Public Affairs office.

Laura,

The first thing you should try is to go to the Talk page for the articles that need updating. You can post the needed corrections there, with an explanation of why you are concerned about making the edits yourself. People who work on that page may make the corrections for you or reply that it's OK to make them yourself.

The link to the Talk page is a tab at the top of the article. You can read more about using Talk pages at the "Discussion and consensus" section of their "Contributing to Wikipedia" article:

Subject: [CONTENT-MANAGERS-L] Looking for a few good Wikipedia edit[or]s...

Hello Content Managers,
Hopefully some of you have deeper ties to the Wikipedia community of editors that I, since my usual channels have failed me...

There are Wikipedia pages (not created by my agency) that discuss programs of the USPTO. Unfortunately, because of various website updates, several of the references/links on these pages no longer work. The Global Dossier program has also changed, and that isn't reflected in Wikipedia. I know there are various concerns within the Wikipedia community about neutrality and having people too close to the subject matter edit entries, so I asked our staff not to touch entries related to our work.

I am looking for some kind souls from the Wikipedia community to clean up these Wikipedia pages so that the links and references again work and the info is accurate.

These errors are really bothering the USPTO staff responsible for these services – they even tracked down the dead links and compiled the new URLS and text changes they think would improve the entries, as outlined below!

Thanks,

Any computer can handle social media and scheduling tools. I can't imagine buying a current laptop that couldn't. So I'd say go inexpensive as long as it has a camera. But you're better off buying an external webcam anyway and a stand (a very good webcam might cost $75). That gives you the flexibility of having one person running the computer while pointing the camera at the person you want the world to see. Mine normally sits on top of my computer, but I can point it elsewhere if needed.

We do a lot on our phones, actually, from posting to live streaming, although an external mic that plugs into the phone is better for recording than the phone's own mic.

I'd like to associate myself with the comments of the gentleman from U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services.

That said, you can go too cheap. Depending on your video platform, your laptop may be obliged to do a bit of the work of processing that video; so skip the dirt-cheapest models. Quick aside: my wife and son have $799 laptops from Costco that are overpowered for just about anything we'd try to do with a laptop. They actually make fairly brilliant desktop replacements.

Then again, you can't shop at Costco for government stuff (probably -- I don't think Uncle Sam has a membership card), so that's an odd standard. A successful purchase is likely to depend on what you plan to do with the machine and how much leeway you want to give yourself for doing other things. For example, if you're likely to be using your device on battery power for long stretches (traveling w/the boss, perhaps?), a Core i7 with discrete graphics and 17" display will fail you in short order. A 13-incher with an i5 and Intel graphics will save on battery, but won't be as helpful for video file editing or conversion. It'll still work, but a box with an i5+Intel gx isn't a screamer. Anything with "atom" in its name, just skip -- too much risk of it running like the Tin Man (slowly -- and with a rusty squeal).

Here's a good hint (fortunate, as I've just complicated matters): Check the specs page of your streaming site. For example, here's a specs page for Livestream Studio: https://help.livestream.com/hc/en-us/articles/212058248-Recommended-Hardware-Specifications-for-Livestream-Studio-?flash\_digest=0effc7f5b09c390ddc208049edf9047bcb735e5 The i5 is fine, but they recommend discrete graphics. One might goof and wind-up with a laptop that drops frames. Who wants that?

Cool?

Larry
