Townshend State Forest & Park

Townshend State Park is located within the 1244-acre Townshend State Forest. The State Forest was established in 1912, making it one of the state's oldest land holdings. Its primary use at the time of acquisition was public day recreation, timber harvesting and the location of a forest fire lookout.

During the Great Depression, a Civilian Conservation Corps camp was based here. The CCC was a national program putting unemployed men to work on public works projects. The CCC laid out a camping and picnic area and constructed a stone house and steel fire lookout tower. Stone was quarried from within the forest. Several of the camp buildings remained, including a large administration dining building, which was used by local Girl Scouts until it burned in the late 1960s.

The landscape of Townshend State Forest is dominated by Bald Mountain, elevation 1680 feet. The mountain's forested slopes are covered with hemlock, white pine, and a variety of hardwoods including sugar maple, red maple, birch and red oak. Many deer spend the winter here, protected from the cold weather and heavy snows by the cover of hemlock trees.

Hiking

Bald Mountain Trail

3.4 miles round trip, 3 hours. Blue blazes.

This hiking trail leads to the summit of Bald Mountain, a vertical climb of 1100 feet from the trailhead at the campground. Vistas provide views to the north, south and east at the summit. The moderate to difficult hike ascends quickly, following the steep ravine of a mountain stream for about the first half mile. The trail then crosses the brook and winds its way up the mountain through hemlocks and hardwood forests. The last ¼ mile is a steep climb with some exposed rocks. The summit is dry and more open, with oaks and hophornbeams among a shaded meadow. Day entry fees apply during the operating season. Parking available during the operating season only.
